Counsels and Precepts. From the French of MGR. CHARLES GAY, with a Preface by the REV. GEORGE BODY, D.D. (Mowbray, 3s. 6d.)

THE translator's note appended to this volume informs the reader that the book consists entirely of extracts from a well-known work, "De la Vie et Des Vertus Chrétiennes, Considérées dans L'état Religieux." The title explains to some extent its import, but the series of essays is addressed more particularly to those who have dedicated their lives exclusively to a religious order than to those who are engaged in daily conflict with the world of men and its thousand trials. At the same time, the student of matters pertaining to faith and the higher aspects of religious experience will find much to interest him and help him, especially, perhaps, in the sections devoted to "Temptation," "Obedience," and "Humility."

The great danger to which all discursive theological works is liable is that of platitude. So much has been written and spoken on these important and significant matters that it is difficult for any person unequipped with special sympathy and intense human insight to utter anything fresh or attractive in the guise of advice as to conduct, or towards the elucidation of the many problems of thought which arise from time to time in the introspective brain. We fear that we cannot altogether exonerate the volume before us from the charge of repetitious and unimpressive question and statement. Throughout an exhortation which extends to 400 pages it is hardly possible, we imagine, considering the immense number of works that have been published of late years bearing upon the spiritual life, to proceed without a certain effect of dilution, and the translator would have been well advised had he asserted his privilege of concentration and given us a book half or a third the size of this; its cogency would have been enhanced, its beauties would have become more evident. The devotional tone, however, is exquisitely pure and pleasing from beginning to end, and it cannot but prove helpful to many for whom the mysteries of suffering and sorrow are hard and inexplicable. The original work being out of print, it is impossible to say anything as to the quality of the translation, but the English is simple and free from any objectionable intrusion of idiom. For those in whose cause the book was primarily written it may well become a consolatory and almost indispensable handbook to their devotional exercises, and for others who are not able to reach the highest levels of spiritual communion many an inspiring thought may be gathered from its pages.

Banzai! By PARABELLUM. (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.)

No fewer than 300,000 copies of this novel have been sold in Germany, and we should be by no means surprised if a similar success awaited the book in this country. Its popularity will not depend on its intrinsic merits as a work of literature, for these are entirely negligible. But "Banzai" has the one and, in these days, all sufficing merit of being topical. It is an invasion story. And, at the present moment, invasion is in the air. You cannot escape from it. It is flooding the columns of our hapenny press. Its possibilities are being eagerly, and somewhat fearfully, discussed alike in the club, the saloon bar, and the working-man's lecture-hall. It has infected even the pulpit. And now fiction claims it as its own.

But the invasion which "Parabellum"—who is reputed to be "a German official of high rank"—invites us to consider is not an invasion of England, nor is it even remotely concerned with the present Naval Estimates. It is nothing less startling, indeed, than a raid by the Japanese upon the United States. For years, you are given to understand, the thing has been in preparation. The Japanese secret service has been busy. Its agents have wormed their way into the American Navy. They have disseminated a spirit of active revolt among the Filipinos. At length the propitious moment arrives. America is surprised, taken unaware, and unprepared. War is declared, and, for a time, the invading force proves victorious. England, while officially maintaining a friendly neutrality, secretly favours its Eastern ally. At length, however, the American people pulls itself together for a supreme rally. The Japanese are finally routed. The yellow peril is averted.

There is a certain breathlessness about all this. And, if our author has spared us some of the sickening details of modern warfare, of which there is so plentiful a supply in such a book (for instance) as Zola's "La Débâcle," he has provided us with a by no means uninteresting study of military tactics. He knows all about armoured trains, aeroplanes, and naval manœuvres. For our own part, however, though we confess to a mild interest in the matter, we remain unthrilled. And, as regards the possibility of such a marauding expedition, we can only say that if the invasion of America by any Power, savage or civilised, would induce that nation to mend its manners, or would tend in any way to the salvation of its soul, we should welcome it as an interposition of Providence. We fear, however, that the day of regeneration has passed by.

THE FIELD

In the Springtime the field lay calm and green after the rains and river-mists, swept by fresh winds, glistening in the light as noon by noon the sun climbed higher in the sky. Among the grass grew tufts of thick leaves that soon would disclose little stars of daisies, or buttercups, which, like advancing armies, would flaunt their golden accoutrements in the bountiful air. From one sheltered corner shone the pale rays of a group of daffodils, from another pushed a tangle of thorny dog-rose stems, bearing the first tight leaf-buds of promise. The white band of frost retreated towards the hedges with the travelling shadow, and morning by morning it became less distinct, just as morning by morning the stark outlines of branches and twigs became blurred in a fine, frail vesture of daintiest green.

Summer found the field deep and fragrant with pink clover and tall, seedling grasses, here and there on its borders a copse of broad dock-leaves and spiry nettles; in July the yellow trumpets of the woodbine burst open and trailed over the top of each hedge. Birds that had sung themselves weary at the mating season were quiet, chirping intermittently in the shade of outspread branches; but the cuckoo's impudent note belled forth now and then from some secret place of his own. The grateful earth gave back the sun's heat in a thousand forms of life; it seemed as though the year was at poise, brooding and peaceful. At the edge scarlet poppies, like sentinels with flaming banners, kept guard over the more humble company within. Then came the reaping-time, when the laughter of the field vanished, and only the heavy scent and a few loose, long swaths of withered clover were left to tell of the braveries gone.

By the Autumn the bitterness of that despoliation had passed. Torn red leaves raced across the cut, freshening stubble; every night a net of gossamer web was let down as if by fairies, light as a dream, to shimmer and quiver in the morning sun as though each thread were a spun filament of glass. Some birds flew off to warmer countries; strange ones took their places; the robin became bold as the first frosts bound the earthy pools. And in the winter the field slept, regardless of snow or rain or sleet, waiting for the wakening rapture of Spring. So, year after year, the seasons spent their circle over the little field.

Then, one Summer day, came man; not in the garb of country reapers or as the labourers with straw in mouth who used to lean over the gate on warm evenings and meditate, but men with curious instruments and notebooks from the city not far away, who looked at the field and did not see its waves of flowers breaking where the wind ruffled it. They went away, and for one more summer the children on their road to school gathered loose handfuls of blossoms for the mistress they loved—those small offerings that hold more than a hint of propitiation for faults as yet uncommitted.

One morning, late in the next Spring, came a company of men with picks and shovels, heavy-handed, gruff of speech, and the first cruel stab into the heart of the field exposed the rich, tawny earth like an open wound. Day after day they laboured. Some worked with their shovels straightly, following guiding lines of string that were pegged down in calculated directions; others tossed the beautiful thick mould into carts, and when a shower came the horses trod their brown path into mud that dried and caked in the next hour of sunshine. Loads of rubbish and stone were wheeled up and pitched contemptuously here and there until the field was unrecognisable, a mere shapeless, disfigured piece of ground. The bees that boomed contentedly along, seeking their old friends among the flowers, went off to find other fields, other blooms; from the lane at the bottom the children looked on, open-eyed and wondering, watching the big, hairy arms at their work, the bearded, burnt faces, watching each wall as it rose into view, speculating among themselves as to what manner of building it would finally be, and how high. For by now the trenches were full, and squared brick and glazed tile began to take the place of rough, common stone. So the summer passed, the last posies were plucked, and the winter came to find the busy crowd still building.

Strange sounds, in the Springtime, after this, haunted the place where so short a while ago dwelt the undisturbed harmonies of Nature. Instead of the hum of many bees came the droning of many wheels; instead of the irregular song of birds came the rhythmic thrust, thrust, thrust of that tireless engine, hidden away in some dark, stony cavern. From the great double doorways at the mid-day whistle poured a stream of men and boys, some to loiter in the sunlight and untie large red 'kerchiefs, disclosing dinner, others to walk off in search of it elsewhere; all to regather as separate rays at their focus as the time for that second imperative siren-scream drew near. Down by the river a bank of purple cinders rose higher and higher, crunched by the feet of men who spent their lives in feeding the insatiable furnace-maw of immense boilers; on one side, up from the blackened rushes at the river-edge, stretched a huge long pile of coal to the wall of the factory, continually lessened, ceaselessly replenished.

One tiny bit of the field remained—a poor, faint spot of dirty grass hardly three feet square, cindery, stony, the thin blades bent and crumpled and ill-nourished, barely visible a few yards away. In the second March after the whirr of machinery had started one solitary daisy peeped up from this dingy plot, as bright and fresh and smiling as though it were one of the innumerable company in some laughing meadow miles away. Towards evening, a man who passed set his heel heavily upon it, and burst the little flower into a shapeless, pitiful thing, and a cartload of clinkers was tipped, jagged and rattling and rolling, upon the patch of dull green. The field was gone.

Many years will pass by, maybe hundreds, maybe a thousand. The sound of wheels will be stilled; the engine will thud and thrust no longer; the dark doorways will be deserted. Each wall will crack and crumble and decay; each iron stanchion will rust and bend and fall; storms work their will, and sunlight pour down to illumine only the blight of impermanence and death. But soon, here and there, thin green blades will peer from among the uneven mounds of wreckage and rubbish. Years will roll on, and a flush will come with the Spring, a confusion of wild flowers with Summer, a tangle of brambles with blackberries for other children at Autumn. Once more the air will be fragrant with sweet odours, musical with songs of birds, clear and fine and smokeless. And at last, with a merciful oblivion for those ruined walls, those rusted iron girders, those memories of human fragility, the field shall again come into its own.

SCAR

SINCE Skinner, this word, in the sense of "mark left by a wound," has been derived from F. escare. Minshew, with a better semantic instinct but a fine disregard for phonology, suggested L. scissura. F. escare represents Latinized Greek escara; it is a mediæval surgeon's term which has passed into F., It., Sp., and E., but has never meant "scar" in the above sense, although, being connected with wounds, it may have been confused with it. Gk. ἐσχάρα means "fire" (focus), and metaphorically "cauterization," "scab," "the crust that is brought upon wounds" (Holyoak), "crusta, sive durities illa, quæ vulneribus per cauteria quædam induci solet, quum sanguis aliter sisti non potest" (Gesner). Its modern meanings are: F. "eschare, croûte noirâtre que forme la désorganisation des tissus dans une partie attaquée par la gangrène ou par l'action d'un caustique" (D.G.); It. "escara, croûte qui se forme sur les plaies" (Morlino); Sp. "escara, the scurf or scurf of a sore" (Velasquez). The identification of this word with our "scar" appears to begin with Cotgrave, who gives "escarre, a skarre, or hard scab upon a wound," and "eschare, a skarre, or hard scab upon a sore, hurt, wound; also the crust, which ariseth upon an actual or potentiall cautery." The gloss "skarre" is here partly suggested by the form of the F. word, and is partly due to the fact that E. esc(h)ar, scar, was actually used in this sense in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, but, in that case, it is a different word from "scar" (cicatrix). Sherwood has only "scarre, cicatrice." For O.F. escare Godefroy (Comp.) gives only "croûte qui se forme sur la peau" (cf. the adj. escarotique, caustic). Florio has "escara, a core or lump of mortified flesh corroded and fetched out of any sore or fistula." Oudin has "escara, escarre," and "escarre, crosta, escara." Delpino (1753) has "escara, a scab of a sore" and "scar, cicatrix." Now, a "scar" is not a scab or crust, but a "mark, seam, cleft, incision," etc., and we find accordingly that it is by words of such meaning that the other European languages express it. L. cicatrix, "a token or scarre of a wound" (Cooper), which has supplied the Romance languages with their names for "scar," means also "seam" (Lewis); cf. Sp. "trepa, fold of a dress, embroidery, scar" (Oudin, Delpino), and Sp. "costuron, a great coarse seam; also a great scar of a wound" (Delpino). It is curious that Cotgrave does not use "scar" in explaining "balafre, a slash over the face, a King Harry cut; a gash, or wipe, over the snout." G. Narbe, scar, is connected by Kluge with narrow; in older G. we find Wundzeichen, Wundmal—i.e., "wound-token, wound-mark," and in Du. wondt-teecken (Hexham), litteeken, older "lidtteeken, cicatrix, vel indicia alicujus rei, cicatrice ou enseignes" (Dict. Trium Linguarum, 1587), identical with O.H.G. "lihzeihhan, body-token" (Franck); cf. It. "segno, any kind of signal, sign, mark, token, brand or scarre" (Torriano); Sp. "señal, signe, marque, vestige, trace; señal de herida, cicatrice, marque d'une playe" (Oudin). Our word "scar," in its present sense, dates from the end of the fourteenth century. It is used by Wiclif to render cicatrix (Stratmann and Bradley). It is not in Wright and Wülcker's vocabularies. Palsgrave has "scarre of a wounde, cousture, trasse, cicatrice." It seems to be rare in M.E. in its modern sense, but more common in that of "cleft." The Prompt. Parv. has "scarre, rima." Gower (Prol. to Con. Am. 507) uses it for a fissure in the bank of a river,† while scarre, used in the Romaunt of the Rose for a chink (fen-deure) in a door, is perhaps the same word corrupted. It does not appear to be in Chaucer or Piers Plowman. It seems clear to me that our word "scar," the furrow left by a healed wound, is identical with this M.E. word meaning "cleft" (cf. the botanical and zoological uses of "scar"), and is thus ultimately the same as "scar (scaur), an old word, signifying a steep rock" (Phillips), which is connected with "shear" (Skeat), as "cliff" with "clip" (Franck, s.v. klip). This word occurs also in F. The D.G. gives the meaning "brèche (dans un mur, une troupe, etc.)" as an archaic application of the medical "eschare, scab." Littré, more correctly, has two separate entries, and identifies the meaning brèche with E. "scar." It occurs in modern Walloon, "skar, escar, écard, brèche" (Sigart, Dict. du Wallon de Mons). Whether the M.E. "scarre, rima" came into E. via F. or represents an Icelandic form (see Skeat, Concise Dict. scar. 2.) is hard to say. In any case, it might easily be confused with F. "escharre, crosta di piaga, die Rinde einer Wunden, vulneris crusta" (Veneroni and Castelli), with which it is etymologically unconnected. This word has given E. esc(h)ar, a crust, shell or scab, brought over an ulcer and raised with a searing iron" (Bailey, 1736), and this is identified with "scar" by some early dictionaries—e.g., "escar, cicatrix" (Ainsworth, 1736), "a hard crust or scar made by hot applications" (Johnson, 1765), the identification being probably helped by the verb sear being occasionally misprinted scar. When Arbutnot writes: "In a hemorrhage from the lungs stypticks are often insignificant; and if they could operate upon the affected part, so far as to make a scar, when that fell off, the disease would return," he is using a medical term derived from L. "eschara, scab." It is hard to believe that this is the same word as that used by Burnet, "This earth had the beauty of youth and blooming nature, and not a wrinkle, scar, or fracture on all its body," or by Shakespeare, "Yet I'll not shed her blood, Nor scar that whiter skin of hers than snow, And smooth as monumental alabaster," or by Arbutnot himself, "I was fond of back-sword or cudgel play, and I now bear in my body many a black and blue gash and scar."

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF BENGAL.

PRÆCIS of communications made at the Monthly General Meeting of 3rd March, 1909.

1. Studies in the Experimental Breeding of Indian Cottons; an introductory note, part II.:—on buds and branching. By H. Martin Leake, M.A.

Every axil on a cotton plant contains two buds, the second being lateral as regards the first. On any axis the position of the second to the first—whether on its right side or on its left side—is almost invariably constant; but the branches of any given plant differ among themselves and the character is apparently not inherited—a plant with secondary buds to the right, not necessarily producing offspring with the buds to the right.

The branches arising from these buds may become sympodia or monopodia; and it is in respect to the behaviour of the secondary buds that a great difference occurs between the different Indian Cottons. Thus in "Nurma" and "Broach," the main secondary buds develop into monopodial branches, while in the Bengalis they develop into sympodial branches. It is the main tertiary buds in "Nurma" and "Broach" which are sympodial. Flowering, the chief duty of the sympodial branches, is thus delayed in "Nurma," "Broach," etc.

†I mean in the sense in which Coriolanus (II., 1) speaks of his "scars." In the same act they are called "cicatrices," "wounds," "marks of merit," "gashes."

The author has in hand observations on the effect of making crosses between types with the secondary branches sympodial and types with monopodial—observations of considerable importance because early flowering races are wanted for profitable cultivation in the neighbourhood of Cawnpur, and if the delaying of flowering, i.e., of forming main Sympodial buds, should be dominant in crosses over the other condition, any other improvements brought in by the crossing would be rendered locally valueless. However, it was found that on crossing a monopodial by a sympodial, the offspring differed very slightly from the sympodial parent, though there might be some increase in number of secondary branches; and in the second (F₂) generation (the flower of the first generation being self-fertilised) the full sympodial type was dominant; but every proportion of sympodial and monopodial branches occurring on a single stem was found.

Sympodial branches are usual pendent, specially when weighed down by fruit, and were a race of cotton to be bred too marked by them the lint from the lowest branches would always get earth-stained. We therefore want a type with the lowest branches monopodial and the upper sympodial. Such types already exist; but their tint is very poor. We need to breed new types with that habit, but better tint; and it is quite evident that to do so the behaviour of the characters touched on in this paper should be worked out in detail.

2. Mahārāja-Kanida-lekha.—A letter to King Kaniska recovered from Tibet. By Mahamahopadhyaya Satis Chandra Vidyabhusana, M.A., Ph.D.

This is the Tibetan version of a Sanskrit letter, which was written by the famous Buddhist monk Mati-citra better known as Asva-ghosa to Kaniska, King of Delhi and Palhava, in response to an invitation which the monk, owing to his age and infirmity, could not accept. The letter, which contains many salutary advices and throws a good deal of light on the growth of Mahāyāna Buddhism in the early centuries of Christ, was translated into Tibetan by the Indian Pandit Virya-prabha and the Tibetan Lama Rin-chen-chog, and edited by Professor Pal-tseg, of Tibet. A copy of this letter was brought from the monastery of Pamiangchi in Sikkim.

3. Notes on the Theory of Souls among the Malays of the Malay Peninsula. By N. Annandale, D.Sc.

This paper is mainly a summary and revision of the author's views, as expressed in an account of the animistic beliefs of the Patini Malays in Fasciculi Malayenses.

4. A new MS. of Buddha Carita. By Mahamahopadhyaya Haraprasad Shastri.

Beal made a translation of the Chinese version of the Buddha Carita, a poem in Sanskrit by Asva-ghosa. This drew the attention of the learned world to that poem in Sanskrit. Two copies of nearly half of the work were in Europe, and Professor E. B. Cowell edited and translated that portion of the work extant in these copies. The copies were made for Bryan Hodgson by Amritananda, the First Residency Pandit of Nepal. The copyist found his original incomplete, and filled it up with verses composed by himself. In the ninth canto there was, however, a long lacuna. Last year an old MS. in palm-leaf was found in the Durbar Library, Nepal, a gift of one Divyadeva to the library, from which the long lacuna has been recovered. There are eleven and one-third verses in the lacuna, which, however, have been translated in sixteen verses in Beal, showing that the Chinese version is not a faithful translation of the original.

5. Tamarisk Manna. By D. Hooper.

Historical references to Gazangabin or Tamarisk Manna in Persia and Arabia. Names and distribution of Manna-yielding species of Tamarix, in Asia. Shiva-i-zamin (sugar of the soil), found in Seistan, traced to the sweet gum of Tamarix Pallasii. Chemical composition and properties of the Manna.

CORRESPONDENCE

"POE AND BALTIMORE."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Referring to the issue of THE ACADEMY of January 30th, I request your kindly correction of statement made in the article entitled "Poe and Baltimore." I do not hesitate to ask this, nor do I doubt your according full recognition to the subject of this letter.

The opening sentence of the article, "There will be no celebration of the Poe Centenary in Baltimore, Maryland," is erroneous.

The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Edgar Allan Poe was celebrated in Baltimore with appropriate and interesting ceremonies, the principal demonstration taking place on the evening of the day, January 19th, 1909, the Johns-Hopkins University and "The Edgar Allan Poe Memorial Association" uniting in this tribute.

The Memorial Association was incorporated and organised on April 19th, 1907, by the members of "The Woman's Literary Club of Baltimore," who had long desired proper recognition of the genius of the poet from their City and State.

With this in view the board of management formed a distinct and separately incorporated organization from the club, thus offering a centre for the accumulation of a fund to erect a monument to Poe in Baltimore.

Plans for a proper commemoration of the centenary had been long in contemplation by the Johns-Hopkins University and "The Edgar Allan Poe Memorial Association," and on December 12th, 1908, Dr. Ira Remsen, the President of the Johns-Hopkins University, in a letter to the President of the Memorial Association, invited its co-operation in the exercises, offering the use of McCoy Hall (the auditorium of the University) for the meeting.

The offer being accepted, the programmes contemplated were merged, and cards were sent out in the names of the University and of the Memorial Association.

The executive board, desiring to reach the students of all colleges and high schools by appropriate exercises, the Hon. Austin L. Crothers, Governor of Maryland, was approached, who in response to the request expressed his approval and endorsement through the Press.

The large number of letters received by the President of the Association from residents throughout Maryland evidenced the general feeling that the day should be honored, and the culmination of the efforts of the executive board was highly satisfactory.

The severe weather, with heavy snow and low temperature, made outdoor features of the celebration impossible, but the early morning light found the Poe Monument in Westminster Churchyard decorated with beautiful flowers and evergreens, roses and carnations, ivy and palms, tributes from individuals, societies, and educational institutions; amongst them was a wreath of laurel from "The Woman's Literary Club of Baltimore," which since 1898 has never failed to place this yearly offering upon the grave of Poe.

Applications for cards of admission to the celebration continued to the hour of the meeting, when a great concourse of the leading citizens of the City responded to the call. The capacity of the hall, which admits of seating 1,200 people, was heavily taxed, the enthusiasm manifested in many ways proving that Baltimore recognised the glory of Poe's genius.

Dr. Ira Remsen presided, and the Rev. Oliver Huckel, D.D., and John Prentiss Poe, Esq., a relative of the poet, and a distinguished member of the Maryland Bar, were the speakers invited by the Memorial Association; Dr. William Peterfield Trent, of Columbia University, New York, represented the Johns-Hopkins University. These three addresses and an original poem read by Miss Lizette Woodworth Reese, of "The Woman's Literary Club," forming a programme of equal dignity and beauty.

I enclose clippings from the Baltimore papers, giving accounts of the founding of the Memorial Association, and further facts connected with the celebration of the centenary.

WHAT MR. GRANVILLE BARKER CAN STUDY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Will you permit me to inform Mr. Granville Barker, whose graceful "courtesy" to those who disagree with him on the subject of "Woman's Suffrage" I shall not imitate, that he had better read an excellent and most able little book called "Mixed Herbs"* if he wants to understand the strong position—strong on every ground of tradition of feeling and of sense—of those who oppose "Woman's Suffrage." It is not a very happy title, but the book itself, by G.M.S. (a working woman), recalls the finer and more delicate methods by which women have ever influenced others in the direction of good sense, humanity, lofty feeling. Let Mr. Granville Barker read this and the leaflet "Back to the Home," and then let him try and invoke his manliest equipment of fairness and good sense, and compare the tone and attitude of the ladies responsible for them with the performances, the most painful mixture of conceit, insolence, and hysteria, going on every Monday at the Queen's Hall. You, sir, may see the point of this little anecdote, for the absolute truth of which I vouch. An old servant of ours, an elderly country woman, much wished to hear the Suffragette leaders. An enthusiast in the "Cause," but one luckily with a sense of fun, took the shrewd old lady a week or two back to Queen's Hall. There, it seems, Miss Christabel, after rebuking Mr. Asquith, and expressing her intention of ruling the British Empire, continued to perorate about "what the women will do" and so forth. The old dame listened attentively, and said not a word, though several times a peculiar expression came into her good old face as she heard the young women from shops and factories calling out "Shime!" When the entertainment was over Miss Pankhurst's apostle said with great fervour:

"Well, now you've seen Miss Christabel. Isn't she splendid?" etc., etc.

Here is the reply, perfectly respectful: "Well, ma'am, who'd have thought a young gel would have so much sarce?" (otherwise sauce), and from this verdict the old lady never budged. Sir, in connection with this singular movement I have long wished to know one thing. Are the accounts thoroughly audited? Also, have the Pankhurst family large means? I conclude so, otherwise how could they afford the gorgeous dresses on the night of the presentation to Mrs. Pankhurst, which a dressmaker friend tells me must have cost in the case of Mrs. Pankhurst at least £12 or £14, and the satin dress of her daughter at least £6 or £8. Miss Annie Henry, the sweet, simple ex-factory girl, also wears silk embroidered gowns. How does she get them? If magnificent satin frocks are part of the "Suffragette" entertainment, I for one shall be thinking of joining in the fun and the fray.

MR. McKENNA'S QUALIFICATIONS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In suggesting that Mr. McKenna's only claim to the headship of the Admiralty Board is that he once rowed bow in the Cambridge eight you do him a grievous injustice, as, like Churchill, Gladstone, Birrell, Runciman, Seely, Trevelyan, and the other principal failures of our Government of carpet-baggers, he took a prominent part in "obbossing dot wicket" Aliens Act.

JOSEPH BANISTER.

"THE REVERSED FOOT."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The letter from your New Zealand correspondent in last week's issue is probably not to be taken as reviving a discussion closed some time ago, its writer's distance from the scene of action justifying exceptional treatment. Perhaps I may be allowed, without re-entering on the general argument, briefly to take note of some points raised by his letter.

*Published by Sampson Low, 2s.

1. The question which prosody must answer I take to be:—"How are the irregular units of prose speech made to produce that impression of regular recurrence which we all feel to be characteristic of verse?" Merely to divide lines into their natural prose units does not answer this question. Can it be said that Mr. Andersen's scansion does more than this, or that they throw light on what constitutes the difference between a prose sentence and a line of verse?

A division-mark has evidently dropped out after "against" in his first example of scansion. "The Mahogany Tree" is by Thackeray, not Macaulay. In the line from Milton quoted near the top of p. 905 should not "despite" be accented on the second syllable?

2. His "altogether different rhythmic construction" of words like abrupt and extreme takes substantially the view which I advocated, and involves "disregarding" the prose stress. That, in these words, falls on the second syllable; alter that in any way, and you are disregarding it. I never suggested reversing it. On the contrary, I expressed doubt whether in such cases there need always be physical disturbance of the prose stress; where that is slight we may simply ignore it.

3. I abstain from stirring the hornets' nest referred to in his closing sentences further than by remarking that admixture of dissyllabic and trisyllabic units in our verse does not necessarily imply admixture of duple and triple rhythms. Lanier says that "no more fruitful source of error has vitiated the theories of verse" than confusion between these two quite distinct issues.

The magazine is published at Sixpence net at the beginning of each month by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send it, post free, inland or abroad, for a year for Eight Shillings.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

sgd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

A powerful and dramatic new romance

BY MARJORIE BOWEN

Is now ready at all libraries, bookshops, etc.
6s. It is entitled

BLACK MAGIC:

A TALE OF THE RISE AND FALL OF ANTICHRIST.

The story, though founded on a legend of the Papacy which has ever been surrounded with mystery and magic, is practically new to fiction, and Miss Bowen has done nothing finer than her description of Old Rome, which, especially in the final scenes, raises the book to a high poetical and romantic level.

SALOME AND THE HEAD

By E. NESBIT, Author of "The Red House," etc. With 12 Illustrations by SPENCER PRYSE. Ready everywhere. 6s.

The Daily Chronicle says: "Let no one suppose that he has here merely 'a horrible shocker.' And no one will suppose it, of course, who knows Mrs. Nesbit's work. The idyllic strain in it is invincible. It is not a matter of sentiment; she can be, and generally is, disconcertingly clear-eyed. For cold-blooded treatment, or ill-treatment, of a probationary hero (and not a bad chap), commend us to that of Mr. Edmund Templar in this book."

CHRISTIAN LITURGIES

Messrs. COPE and FENWICK beg to announce that they have made arrangements for the publication of a series of Christian Liturgies translated from the original languages by competent scholars, and in many cases hitherto inaccessible to English readers.

There are five main families or groups of Liturgies, three of them Eastern in origin and use, one Eastern in origin but Western in use, one Western both in origin and use. They are known either by the names of the Apostles with whom they are traditionally connected, or by the names of the countries or cities in which they are known or believed to have been once or always in use.

It is the aim of the Publishers to present these Liturgies in a form that will render them useful not only to the Clergy and to Students, but to all who are interested in the History of Religion.

With this object each Volume contains a carefully written Introduction giving a history of the rite, an account of the vestments of the clergy, and of the ornaments of the Church, and an analysis of the distinctive features of the Liturgy.

(1) The Armenian Liturgy

[Ready]

The First Volume contains the Divine Liturgy of the Holy Apostolic Church of Armenia.

This Liturgy is said to date from the First Century, and to have been founded on that of the Church of Jerusalem. St. Gregory, the Illuminator, re-modelled it and introduced the Nicene Creed, and prayers from the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great were introduced in 430 A.D.

On account of its antiquity, its precious characteristics, the beauty and richness of its imagery, this Liturgy appeals to the lover of literature no less than to the theologian.

(2) The Coptic Liturgy

[Ready]

The Publishers have been fortunate in securing permission to include in the Series the late Marquis of Bute's translation of the Coptic Liturgy.

The particular ritual of the Egyptian Christians commands special interest in view of the remarkable influence which it has had over the destinies of these extraordinary people, who, for over a thousand years, in the face of continued insult and persecution, have retained the Christian faith.

(3) The Russian Liturgy

[Ready]

The third Volume contains the Liturgy of the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic (Greco-Russian) Church, compiled, translated, and arranged from the Old Church-Slavonic Service Books of the Russian Church.

The books are printed on a specially made paper, in large, clear type, with wide margins. The ritual directions are printed in red.

A suitable binding has been designed for the series, and the Volumes are in post quarto size. The price of each Volume in the series is 5s. net. They can be obtained from any bookseller, or post free (5s. 4d.) direct from the Publishers.

TURKEY IN REVOLUTION

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations, 7/6 net.

This is the first book which has been published on the bloodless but far-reaching Revolution in Turkey, an event worthy of a place beside the great liberating movements of Greece and Italy, and destined to change profoundly the issues of the Near Eastern question. It contains information which can only be learnt from the lips of the actual authors of the movement. These Mr. Buxton has had a unique opportunity of knowing personally, having accompanied his brother, Mr. Noel Buxton, the chairman of the Balkan Committee, in the recent deputation to Constantinople. He describes the leading Young Turks, the Sultan, the Grand Vizier, the Sheikh-ul-Islam, and the growth, success, prospects and dangers of the new movement.

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"... He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible hitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chalonér believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chalonér goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horseshoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

A second sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly hags and matrons fair!
His votaresses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chalonér steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spangl'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!

But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chalonér to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

Dr. Sera is a physician who has deeply studied literature and historical science, and the object of his book is, in the opening words of the preface, "to establish our conception of social life on its original basis." These are the Letters that passed between Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh from the time of their first meeting in May, 1821, until their marriage in October, 1826. There are in all 176 Letters, arranged chronologically in the form of "letter and answer." The account of the courtship contained in these Letters is more fascinating than a romance. They are brilliant and pathetic by turn, wise and witty; light and grave; and they tell for the first time the story of the early association of this remarkable pair, and the influence of one character upon the other is clearly indicated. YOUTH—with its hopes and despairs, its loves and griefs, its triumphs and disappointments, its illusions and revelations—is the theme of Mrs. Herbert's daring novel. Francie finds his illusions destroyed, his idols with feet of clay, and his wife a mere doll, to whom he proposed in the glamour of the moment. Still, through everything he preserves his faith in the ultimate fitness of things, and the novel's close finds him "blistered and buffeted, unbuffed still."

LIFE AND LETTERS

In last week's issue of the Sketch there appears on page three hundred and forty-nine a full-length photographic portrait of a German Jewish gentleman, Herr Meyer. Herr Meyer is attired in royal robes and has a crown on his head, and underneath the picture we read the following words:

The German King Edward VII.: The King's Double.

That the photograph in question bears a superficial resemblance to the King, and that it might conceivably be mistaken for a photograph of His Majesty we shall not deny. But we consider that for the Sketch to make use of the coincidence of an accidental likeness to suggest that His Majesty resembles a German Jew is altogether unpardonable, and is calculated to create a most unfortunate impression.

Mr. William Archer has not yet favoured us with the name of some play which has been accepted and staged as the direct or indirect result of his professional attendance upon it in the capacity of play doctor. Surely there must be one instance on record; and surely out of the large number of persons who have parted with sums varying from thirty shillings to three pounds ten in the way of fees to Mr. Archer there must be at least one person who is willing to come forward and say that he got his money's worth in the commercial as well as in the literary sense. Mr. Archer dodged our enquiry as to his actual cures when he wrote to us, and apparently he is still disposed to dodge it. We should have a feeling of great respect for him if he were to inform us that unhappily none of the would-be playwrights who have paid him fees has as yet achieved financial success. In point of fact, it seems to us more than likely that none of them has, and it is a pity that Mr. Archer lacks the pluck to own up. On the other hand, we may be entirely mistaken, and if we are mistaken, we think that out of common charity and a reasonable respect for the literary business, Mr. Archer might safely indulge us with just one instance.

Meanwhile, we have received from Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie the following opportune letter:

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

Sir,—Your interesting articles on our arrangement with Mr. William Archer for reading and criticising plays seem to be based on the supposition that it is somehow profitable to us to induce hopelessly amateur playwrights to send us their plays, and that Mr. Archer is lending his distinguished name to such a catchpenny device. Nothing could be further from the facts. We have many immediate openings for effective, workmanlike plays, and have no difficulty in getting immediate consideration of such plays from the managers without making use of Mr. Archer's admirable criticisms, simply because most managers know by this time that we refuse to offer plays that are not at least worth serious consideration. It was never Mr. Archer's intention, or ours, to make his criticisms help in the placing of plays in any other way than by helping to make those plays better worth managers' consideration. They are, besides, mostly too searching to serve as an enticing exhibit to managers, unless portions of them were selected, a proceeding to which Mr. Archer very properly objected.

Yours faithfully,

CURTIS BROWN AND MASSIE.

Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie are ingenious people. They perceive that advertisement is a useful thing, and they have written this letter in the pure spirit of the enterprising advertiser. We make no objection, particularly as they go out of their way to speak of Mr. Archer's "distinguished name." We have every respect for Mr. Archer's attainments, such as they are, and we have already made proper acknowledgment of his position among the dramatic critics. But "distinguished" is Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's epithet, and not ours. Furthermore, we have never suggested that it is profitable to them to induce hopelessly amateur playwrights to patronise their agency. At the same time, it would be interesting to know upon what terms the firm undertake the agency work of dramatic authors—that is to say, whether they handle plays at commission rates or whether they charge a fee. And in the latter event do they decline to act and decline to accept the fees of hopelessly amateur authors? As we conceive the literary agency business, it amounts simply to the taking of fees or commissions for the sale of authors' work. We believe that it is not the business of the literary agent to advise an author as to his hopelessness or otherwise. The author sends in manuscripts and fees, and it is the business of the literary agent to keep the money and circulate the manuscripts. If the most hopeless playwright in the world sent Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie the most hopeless play that was ever written, together with a cheque for fifty guineas and a request that the play be submitted to every manager in London, Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie would not send back the cheque, and there would be no dishonour or discredit about the transaction. But when Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie, or any other firm of dramatic agents, put up "the distinguished name" of Mr. Archer or any other dramatic critic in their advertisements, they must have some purpose in so doing.

And what is their purpose? We do not profess to have an inside knowledge of Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's professional mind. But do they ask us to believe that Mr. Archer is set forward as an inducement to authors who can be described as other than amateur and hopelessly unsuccessful? Because if they do we shall not believe them. If Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie are not prepared to take the fee of the hopeless amateur, they have no need for advertising of the kind which they set forward in the Author. If they do not take the hopeless amateur's fees they should say so in their advertisements. They should say: "This agency is intended for the service of dramatic authors who desire to be relieved of business details. Authors who have not had acceptance, or whose plays turn out to be hopeless on perusal, will have their manuscripts and their fees returned." This would be the fair, square, and above board method of doing business. As Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's advertisement now stands, the next ambitious shop-boy or servant-girl or country curate who peruses it is open to draw from it what we conceive to be the mistaken conclusion that Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie, partly by virtue of their connection with Mr. Archer and partly through the fact that "they have many openings for good plays," are in a position in some way to help and assist the struggling author. Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie have no more openings for good plays than the usual openings, which openings are just as much in the hands of the Postmaster-General as they are in the hands of Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie. The Postmaster-General might conceivably take from an author a pound in postage stamps for lugging his cherished MSS. round London. Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie may be able to do it for less money, or they may not. Our advice to all amateur authors is that they should put their trust in the Postmaster-General, who, despite his lack of association with Mr. William Archer, is the best dramatic agent, even as he is the best literary agent in England. It is only your bloated successful author or playwright who can employ an agent with any real advantage other than the saving of trouble in parcel wrapping and stamp licking.

We are glad to find that the April number of the Cornhill Magazine contains a short poem of some quality. We quote the first and last stanzas:

Let me enjoy the earth no less
Because the all-enacting Might
That fashioned forth its loveliness
Had other aims than my delight.

And some day hence, toward Paradise
And all its blest—if such should be—
I will cast glad, afar-off eyes,
Though it contain no place for me.

The author is Mr. Thomas Hardy. We will give Mr. Shorter a new fountain pen and a copy of the "Golden Treasury" if he will tell us why Mr. Thomas Hardy's poem is a good poem and why Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's effort in the March Cornhill was a bad one.

The times are out of joint. In the first number of Nash's Magazine there is a story called "Little Foxes," by a Mr. Rudyard Kipling. We understand that this rising young author has been paid nine hundred pounds for "Little Foxes," which works out at half-a-crown a word, or some similarly idiotic rate. We have struggled with the first two pages of "Little Foxes," and we would much rather have the nine hundred pounds. Mr. Nash could have done better with his money. Mr. Kipling, it is true, has written worse stories, but we have to thank our lucky stars that he has also written inestimably better. When Nash's Magazine gets its sea legs, so to speak, it will no doubt be a considerable magazine; for the publisher is evidently determined to spare no expense in the matter of securing talent. We confess with pain, however, that so far as number one is concerned the talent has failed Mr. Nash utterly. And we should like to know upon what pretext the editor of Nash's Magazine ventures to serve up to us over the name of "The Whisker King" that old, old hirsute story about the Russian Admiral and Monte Carlo. If we remember rightly, this artless tale is to be found in Mr. Victor Bethel's admirable little book about Monte Carlo, where it is told with all the skill and point which it is worth. Mr. Richardson retells it for us in No. 1 of Nash's Magazine in an altogether clumsy and unconvincing manner. Old stories are good when they are not spoilt.

Here is another chance for Mr. Shorter. The April English Review contains two new poems by Mr. Thomas Hardy. We should advise Mr. Shorter to apply to one of his numerous friends for an opinion on the following stanza:

Who now recalls those crowded rooms
Of old yclept, "The Argyle,"
Where to the deep Drum-polka's booms,
We hopped in boisterous style?
Whither have danced those damsels now?
Is Death the partner who doth moue
Their wormy chaps and bare?
Do their spectres spin like sparks within
The smoky halls of the Prince of Sin
To a thunderous Jullien air?

We will pass no opinion upon these lines until the great Shorter has said his particular say. "Gentlemen, pray silence for the pricker of the bubble of Palgrave's 'Golden Treasury'!" For the rest of the contents of the English Review, they would appear to have been lifted holus-bolus from the pellucid penny columns of the New Age—Arnold Bennett, Edward Garnett, Edward Thomas, and Edgar Jepson, bleaters of 'isms to a man and "intellectuals" from the hospitable Soho board of the delightful Mr. Orage. Apparently, however, Mr. Hueffer sets no great store by his New Age recruits, for on the cover of his magazine he stars an article entitled "Blue Water and the Thin Red Line," presumably by himself. Here is a sample passage from this wonderful article, or, rather, series of paragraphs:

The English Review stands for peace, for, as a writer on another page remarks, to peace Phidias belongs. It is only in times of peace that the arts flourish; therefore our motives will hardly be doubted if we insist that this country must have the consciousness of invulnerability. At the same time, or, at any rate, at first glance, nothing ought to be more captivating to the intellect or more easy to arrange than an agreement between this country and the German Empire for the restriction of armaments.

Mr. Belloc would doubtless call the latter part of this paragraph a lie. We shall merely content ourselves with saying that it is not true, and that we are grieved to see a journal which has appropriated a respectable title indulging such flagrantly disingenuous statements. We say disingenuous advisedly, because we cannot believe that a gentleman of Mr. Hueffer's all-British name is so grossly uninformed as to be unaware of the fact that Germany has flatly declined on at least two distinct occasions to discuss or to entertain any question of agreement. On the whole, the English Review has served up to now a certain good purpose, inasmuch as it has proved beyond a doubt that the Socialists are as rotten intellectually as they are politically. As soon as Mr. Hueffer's money is done the English Review closes its doors, and we will wager a new hat against a bottle of bad Medoc that it will not run into as many numbers as the ill-fated journal from which it copied its name.

The memory of Edward Fitzgerald will probably never be allowed to droop and fade. There is the Omar Club to keep it alive in the newspapers, and, what is a good deal more important, there is Fitz-Gerald's monstrous fine "rendering" of Omar. We observe, however, with some alarm, that the Omarians, as they prettily dub themselves, would appear to be a trifle overcharged with what we may term centenary zeal. For at the present moment they seem incapable of opening their mouths or unsheathing their fountain pens without setting up FitzGerald for a god and the Rubiyat for a religion. In point of fact, and despite the idiotic anecdotes about him which have lately been trotted out by Mr. Lucas and that humble chronicler of small beer, W. P. James, FitzGerald had little of the god in him, and, as we all know, his quatrains are not in the least to be recommended, unless one takes them as sheer poetry. Apart from grave matters, here is a paragraph which should interest not only good Omarians but lovers of poetry in general:

At Woodbridge and Ipswich on Saturday admirers of Edward FitzGerald assembled to celebrate the centenary of his birth. Among the pilgrims to visit the district where FitzGerald was born and spent most of his life were Mr. Birrell, Mr. Max Pemberton, Mr. Clement Shorter, and Dr. Robertson Nicoll. In the evening a commemorative dinner was held at Ipswich. "The Immortal Memory of Edward FitzGerald" was proposed by Mr. Shorter. Responding to the toast of "Literature," proposed by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, Mr. Birrell said they were there to do honour to FitzGerald's genius, and to express delight and unfeigned enjoyment in his works. Mr. Birrell said he would urge parents to give children an early opportunity of forming a taste for literature, which would afford them enormous happiness.

Mr. Birrell, Mr. Max Pemberton, Mr. Clement Shorter and Dr. Robertson Nicoll! Poor old Fitz! And Nicoll responding to the toast of "Literature" at a FitzGerald dinner, as Shorter once did at a centenary dinner at Madam Tussaud's Exhibition! And Max Pemberton, who "when travelling abroad always carries a revolver," turning up to do honour to the immortal memory of a poet like FitzGerald! And Mr. Birrell, the good, kind, tuppenny-hapenny Nonconformist Secretary for Ireland, urging parents to give children an early opportunity of forming a taste for literature, which, mark you, "would afford them enormous happiness!" It is lucky for this precious quartette—that is to say, Birrell, Pemberton, Shorter and Nicoll—that FitzGerald is in his grave. His views as to the pious Birrell and the much more pious Nicoll, not to mention his views as to Max Pemberton and Clement Shorter, would have been forcible hearing. Even the Garrick Club must have stared to read of Max Pemberton, once we believe "Mr. Answers," spreading himself in the interests of literature at a FitzGerald dinner.

In John Bull for Saturday, April 3rd, Mr. Bottomley informs all and sundry that henceforth he "will not submit to any further exactions at the hands of disappointed speculators." John Bull of April 3rd was published on Thursday morning. On Thursday afternoon an English jury found that on "February 21st Mr. Bottomley made intentional misrepresentations" to a purchaser of shares in the John Bull Investment Trust and Agency. Bottomley's next book will, no doubt, be dedicated to this jury, just as the impertinent shillingsworth he is now circulating is dedicated to Sir Henry George Smallman, Knight, and Sir James Thomson Ritchie, Baronet. We are not disappointed speculators, inasmuch as we have never put up a penny-piece with Mr. Bottomley in our lives. But we should strongly advise all persons who have placed money with Mr. Bottomley or his Company in respect of the John Bull Trust and Agency to sue for its return. Mr. Bottomley's determinations are of no consequence in the least in the face of the law of England.

"THE DAYS OF THE HALCYONS"

It is the halcyon's season. No gust heaves
On the cold hill-side, in the wrinkled leaves,
Fluttering with variable light the crust
Of jasper and pale selenite, and dust
Of sea-cold beryl on the pasturage;
The grey fly floats above the barren hedge, Unmurmuring. Then, unintermitted, broke
A glory on the red leaf on the oak,
And on the shallow river-pools that keep Rich stain of leaf; the gulls above the deep Shine, and are changed, and melt upon the air.
High up in open silence, bright and bare,
The sun unfolds upon the ocean. There
The hueless steady waters, like a cloud
Moved not, nor shook at all, only the loud
And sleepless impulses of its pale breast
Burst on the shallows, and die in wide unrest
Upon the wave-worn horns and cloven bays;
For Æolus, who lifts the deep, and lays,
Restrains; while in some trembling glaze of light
Below a shaft of sunny mist, the bright
And blue-plumed Halcyon, Thetis' sacred bird, Broods on its moist and floating nest, unstirred.

M. JOURDAIN.

DREADNOUGHTS

THE people of England are beginning to learn a lesson. Some years back, on the strength of various specious cries, they returned a Liberal Government to power. The people of England were assured by an army of frothy Liberal carpet-baggers that the turn of the democracy had arrived and that for the future the country was to be wisely governed by the "intellectual" and the working man. As types of the "intellectual" they put up Mr. Winston Churchill and Mr. Belloc, and in order to befool the working man to the top of his bent they made a Cabinet Minister out of that grubby little proser and washing-carrier, John Burns; and in the sweet name of Nonconformity they also made a Cabinet Minister of Mr. Lloyd George, a Welsh attorney and a member of the firm of Lloyd George, Roberts and Company. And, to crown all, they took for a Prime Minister Mr. H. H. Asquith, a barrister-at-law, who is said, to his credit, formerly to have resided over a grocer's shop. We are going to assume that these gentlemen are personally the nicest men in the world and the most honourable. We are going to assume that as sturdy Liberals they indulge a stern contempt for power and emolument, and that they regard their salaries and patronage as the sheerly irksome and regrettable burdens of greatness. We shall go further and forgive them innumerable indiscretions of speech and many foolish and dangerous acts. We shall forgive them their babble about the blood of the House of Lords. We shall set down their talk as to robbing hen-roosts for the mere persiflage of honest men. We shall consider their Licensing Bill in the light of a charming Parliamentary joke, which amused the country and which might, on the whole, have cost us a great deal more than it did; and we shall consider their coquetries with Socialism and Suffragitism and Militarism and the general body of cheap isms as the natural ebullition and overflow of the cheerful, hearty, brisk, bright and breezy, brotherly Liberal spirit. There they sit in a House of Commons specially made and provided for them, honest, sincere and unaffected patriots to a man, without spot, blemish, tarnish, flaw or fault, a happy and distinguished family, typical of English statesmanship at its highest, of English character at its noblest, and of the English genius for honesty at its ripest. The people of England, whose enthusiasm and sympathy for the persons they put into power is unbounded, will agree with us that the foregoing admissions and encomiums are nothing more than the great teetotal Government's due. But the people of England, poor souls, will not go further than that; for, as we have said, they are beginning to learn a lesson, which lesson is that if you set a Liberal on horseback his very honesty and nobility of mind compel him to ride vigorously to the Devil, dragging you after him. Messrs. Asquith, Winston Churchill, Lloyd George and John Burns are born riders of circus buck-jumpers. They simply insist upon keeping their seats, and as masters of the art of sitting tight and whooping loudly over their wonderful ability they have probably never been equalled. So long as the circus is solvent they will shout and continue to throw the lariat and corral-up the Indians and draw their pay, and small blame to them. They have had some years of it, and if the truth must be told their immoral spotted horses, not to mention themselves, would appear to be as fresh as ever. On the other hand, the public delight is not by any means what it was. There are dangers toward, which are not pleasant to the public contemplation. We shall not harrow up the feelings of our fellow creatures by rehearsing here the names of those dangers. We will merely content ourselves with pointing out that in the House of Commons the other night Sir Edward Grey set forward those dangers in the most complete and unreserved way, and there can now no longer be the slightest question as to their existence. Sir Edward Grey is a member of Mr. Asquith's cowboy troupe, and he is absolutely the only sane member of it. The fancy horsemanship and the whooping and the lariat casting are not for him. He is there to deal for England with the real world outside the circus, and, luckily for England, he is a plain man with a natural instinct for straightforwardness and a proper appreciation for the fact that his peculiar office renders him superior to the calls of party. Sir Edward Grey is the one minister in His Majesty's Government to whom Mr. Asquith cannot dictate. If Mr. Asquith and his cowboys could have had their way Sir Edward Grey's speech on the Navy the other evening would never have been made in the terms in which it was made. As a matter of fact, it was a speech for the country and not at all for the Liberal Government. It was virtually a speech in the gravest and clearest support of the Vote of Censure. And, coming from such a quarter, it was a deadly and unanswerable condemnation of the Government. Mr. Asquith and his cowboys must have writhed in their seats during its delivery. In effect Sir Edward Grey told the House of Commons, and told the country, that at least eight Dreadnoughts ought to be laid down at once. He attempted no concealment, and as is his wont he put the issue in the baldest and simplest language. No reasonable person can have misunderstood him. Even Mr. Asquith and the cowboys must have understood him, and the Liberal rank and file must have understood him to a man. Yet, what happened? Well, Mr. Asquith got up and gave us the usual forensic display. Virtually and by implication he told the House to take no notice of what Sir Edward Grey had said. "We have a majority, and we shall do as we like. And as for the country which sent us here it may be damned till it can get rid of us. We sincerely believe, in spite of what our own Foreign Minister tells us and in spite of the obvious facts, that the naval supremacy of England is in no danger, and that if it is in danger there is no need for us to build Dreadnoughts." Mr. Asquith is a lawyer, which is really the horrible fact about him. He has been accustomed to draft defences which run: "The defendant denies that he made use of the words complained of, and if he did use them they are true in substance and in fact." To the plain man such quibbles look like dishonesty; but all the judges at King's Bench will assure you that this is the legal way of putting things, and that it is perfectly proper and necessary. Mr. Asquith naturally brings his legal mind to bear upon the affairs of his party—we will not say of his country. Sir Edward Grey says "We want eight Dreadnoughts." Mr. Asquith says "We want eight Dreadnoughts, but at the same time we don't want eight Dreadnoughts, and if we do want eight Dreadnoughts we don't want eight Dreadnoughts." And in any case Mr. Asquith is not going to be a party to the provision of them. "Dr." Clifford might object, and, in point of fact, "Dr." Clifford would object. And Mr. Lloyd George would object. We have had enough of this Scotch and Welsh lawyering. We have been told that the people who insist upon an English navy which, on paper at any rate, could be guaranteed to encounter the German navy with a few ships left over after the encounter, are scaremongers. We have been told even that His Majesty the King is displeased with the scaremongers. For our own part, we care nothing who is displeased. Sir Edward Grey has told us that eight Dreadnoughts are wanted and eight Dreadnoughts we must have. The House of Lords, upon whom the people of this country always ultimately depend, will see to it that these eight Dreadnoughts are laid down forthwith. It is the House of Lords that represents the settled opinion of England. Majorities in the Commons are a fortuitous and ephemeral expression. At the present moment every Englishman bar "Dr." Clifford and Mr. Lloyd George wants Dreadnoughts. Even Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill and Mr. Burns want them—as private Englishmen; otherwise they are bigger fools than we take them for. The Lords will provide these Dreadnoughts and they will provide them by throwing out Mr. Lloyd George's Budget and forcing Mr. Asquith to go to the country. The result is a foregone conclusion, and, even if it were not, the necessity is there and the House of Lords will not flinch from its plain duty. It is high time that this graceless combination of persons, who call themselves the Liberal Government and have no more capacity for rule than the next cabman, should be pulled up short on a trifle of stern statesmanship. Is there a man amongst us who would trust Mr. Asquith or Mr. Winston Churchill or Mr. Lloyd George or Mr. John Burns with the management of an ordinary-sized drapery business? Why should we, therefore, leave them to play at their own sweet will with the vital necessities of the nation? Pensions or no pensions, they must come out.

THE PIERCING CRIES OF MR. PEARSON

WHEN a man rises from a job obtained in a Tit-Bits prize competition to be owner—or, at any rate, part owner—and ober-editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette, not to say Vice-President of the Tariff Reform League, it is obvious that one should speak of him with bated breath and whispered humbleness. So that we here and now say "C. Arthur Pearson" in bland and dulcet tones. We shall venture to note, however, before quite dismissing our friend's shining appellation that it is prominently and indelibly associated with an ugly penny weekly paper called Pearson's Weekly, the which ugly penny weekly paper was, we believe, the only begetter of the missing word competition, and is still inviting its millions of readers to send it sixpence on the off-chance of "securing" "a record changelets prize." This Mr. Pearson, too, is the close bosom friend of that Mr. Peter Keary, J.P., who wrote a book called "Get On or Get Out," wherein the youth of the country is advised not to "slop over" and not to be a lobster. Everybody will admit that, despite the well-known dulness and illiteracy of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette, the fact of Mr. Pearson's control of its "destinies" indicates on the whole that he has risen in life; and for our part we make no difficulty about felicitating him on his advancement. But when a man acquires by purchase or otherwise a great position he might conceivably be expected to live up to it. From the governing power of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette, for example, you would not expect altogether the same methods of business or thought that you would expect from the governing power of, say, Pearson's Weekly. It is true that in an issue of Pearson's Weekly which lies before us we are informed that "A squealing in the tunnel is not always in the brakes" may be considered a "funny" "changelet rendering" of "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," and that in the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette we are implored to solve the following English parallel:

In peace and safety day by day
See me my charge contain;
Cut off my head, and to the fray
I charge with might and main.

But in the main the two journals have nothing in common, and, as we have said, one does not expect to find them soaring in similar intellectual or commercial planes. All of which we hope will serve properly to clear the ground. Last week we called attention to certain acts and deeds on the part of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette. We asserted that our contemporary had been guilty of taking from their context certain remarks which had appeared in THE ACADEMY, and that by printing them without their context and under misleading sub-titles had made THE ACADEMY appear to say the direct contrary of what it actually said. Prior to making public reference to the facts we had taken the trouble to write to certain persons in authority on the Standard newspaper and we have in writing the assurance of the editor of the morning Standard that he had shown our letter to the editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette. This would be an unimportant circumstance were it not that the editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette, egged on evidently by Mr. C. Arthur Pearson, with whom we have also communicated on the subject, has disclaimed in his own paper that he is in any way responsible. In the issue of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette of Saturday last Mr. Pearson's noble editor says flatly that, while it is not his wish to concern himself with THE ACADEMY's "distressing accusation," it is astonishing that "even those who are engaged in another branch of the same trade as our own are capable of the bland assumption that the editor of an evening paper himself puts scissors or pen to paper over every paragraph that appears under his control." This gentleman's airy dismissal of distressing accusations which he is not prepared to discuss, for the very simple reason that he cannot discuss them with any show of credit to his paper, bears its condemnation on the face of it; and when he tries to shuffle out by making foolish assertions as to our want of knowledge of his "trade" and the illusions under which we labour he succeeds simply in rendering himself ridiculous. We have never suggested that the editor of a paper must write or paste out every paragraph that appears in that paper's columns; nor have we ever supposed that the editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette did the paste and scissors work of his office. But we do say and maintain that, while that paste and scissors work may not be done by the editor himself, he is just as responsible for it—that is to say, if he be editor at all—as he is responsible for any other matter which may appear in the paper. And if the editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette, whoever he may be, is not responsible for the misleading extracts which he has quoted from THE ACADEMY and the misleading titles which have been put over those extracts we should like to know who is responsible. For our own part—and we base this assumption upon the general tenor of Mr. Pearson's editor's article on the subject—we are disposed to conclude that the editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette must be one of those editors who are really sub-editors, and who possess no large or real control of the papers over which they are supposed to preside. For Mr. Pearson's editor informs us in bitter tones and by innuendo that the editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette is neither "omniscient nor in his own sphere omnipotent"; neither is he "possessed of incredible calm, dignity, responsibility and power." He does not "plan with majestic deliberation the course of the day's operations." "Men do not fly hither and thither at his nod." He is silly enough to soil his "delicate fingers with the grime of the composing room." He "allows the even tenor of his high thoughts to be disturbed by a too active participation in desperate rushes to get formes locked up and sent down to the machine room by a particular second of time." His subordinates do not quake "at the fear of his impartial censure." He is "harassed with news services; plagued with sporting results and badgered with mechanical difficulties connected with paper, ink and presses." He never consults with his leader-writers or reviewers; he does not lunch with princes or premiers, and, in short, he is just a common over-pushed, perspiring sub-editor, and not an editor at all. The editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette says all this of himself by implication; the phrases we have quoted are his own phrases, and phrases which he assures us together express the public illusion as to the functions of the editor of a paper like the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette. But he asserts roundly that the public are wrong in their view, and he suggests that if he chose to reveal "the secrets of the prison house" the public would probably be surprised. Consequently we are compelled to assume that the editor of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette is not his own master and that the people who do his scissoring for him are not under his control; and as he declines to be responsible for their lapses from journalistic grace, we can assume only that the responsible person is Mr. C. Arthur Pearson himself. In any case, we shall take this opportunity of advising the Vice-President of the Tariff Reform League and the ex-manager of Tit-Bits, as well as the founder of Pearson's Weekly and the part owner of the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette, that for convenience's sake and in the face of the repudiation of his editor, we shall for the future hold him personally responsible for any further misleading quotations from THE ACADEMY, or disingenuous headlines, which the Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette may desire to publish. On one other point we must have a word with Mr. Pearson. His editor says that THE ACADEMY "seems to appear once a week." This is clumsy impertinence, but it is, nevertheless, impertinence, and Mr. Pearson may be interested to know that THE ACADEMY was appearing once a week when Sir George Newnes was in the drapery trade and Mr. Pearson was having his ears boxed at school. THE ACADEMY has been seeming to appear for the last forty years, and the illusion is not likely to be destroyed.

THE THEOLOGY OF THE SYNAGOGUE

Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology. By S. SCHECHTER, M.A., Litt.D. (Cantab.) (A. and C. Black.)

MR. SCHECHTER remarks incidentally "Judaism means to convert the world, not to convert itself . . . it has confidence in the world; it hopes, it prays and waits patiently for the great day when the world will be ripe for its acceptance." These words may be taken to mark his own position as an orthodox Jew of the modern school, and perhaps the original motive of his book—namely, to clear the way for the day which he desires. His book, however, is by no means controversial; its title announces its contents precisely. He has read a great quantity of Rabbinic theology and modern comments upon it, and he has collected with much labour many sayings of Rabbis on certain points of doctrine, mainly such conceptions as God, Revelation, Election, Sin, Retribution, Holiness. He offers "no philosophic exposition of the body of doctrine of the Synagogue, nor does he offer a description of its system of ethics." It would be impossible at present for any writer to do either; the Rabbinic theology is a vast and confused subject, and the enthusiastic studies of modern Jews have yet carried them but a short way into it, but so far as they, and some Gentiles also, have gone, there does not appear to be any system at all. Nevertheless, sufficient has been published on the subject in recent times to show that the contempt into which it fell among Gentiles was wholly misplaced. Though the Rabbinical writings do contain, as Mr. Schechter is at no pains to conceal, much that is puerile, they also deal with primary ideas common to all forms of religion, in an immense variety of aspects, with a sublimity of view and expression which has been seldom surpassed. The devout Christian, for example, may find much of suggestive value in the quotations collected by Mr. Schechter on the subjects already named.

The Unity of God, His election of the Jews, His revelation of Himself to them, and the Forgiveness of Sins, with certain ideas directly emanating from these, may be regarded as the only dogmas appearing clearly without contradiction in the Rabbinic writings. As has often been said before, these writers carry the method of expression by contradiction to such a pitch that there is scarcely another element of the Jewish faith which is not controverted, and even these, with the exception of the Unity of God, are modified in a hundred contradictory ways. Compared with the Judaism of the Old Testament, the Rabbis emphasise much more strongly the mercy of God, and extend it more definitely to all mankind. They assume very distinctly the immortality of the soul, and even the more practical tend to mysticism. Even before the destruction of the Temple of necessity abolished the ritual sacrifices, there was a tendency to teach that good works, though not a substitute, had equal effect in reconciling the individual soul to God. But their language about God the Holy Unity is very little less anthropomorphic than that of the Old Testament; their national feeling, though generally freed from its former cruelty, is no less intense; and the immense importance has wisely continued to be attached, even down to the present time, to such points of ritual, and especially of domestic ritual, as it has been possible to observe. The early captivities had rendered Judaism more spiritual, the influence of the Greeks rendered it more philosophical, the advent of Christianity forced it, lest the Holy Unity should appear by contrast unmindful of mankind, to manifest It in the more winning attributes of human nature. The immense foreign influences over the Rabbinic writings are indeed one of their most evident characteristics. A large number of the questions discussed can be shown to have direct reference to the doctrines of the early heresies of the Christian era, partly Greek, partly Christian and partly Judaic. But there were two elements never adopted into Judaism: systematisation and logical expression.

The body of Rabbinic doctrine is like a rock of crystal, of which each Rabbi has polished a facet; or a lump of iron in a forge, on which each has struck his blow. It is as enduring as the iron and as luminous as the crystal, but shapeless. Each facet emits a spark of light, but there is no united glow. Each individual Rabbi responds to the universal enlightenment of God with his own refracted revelation. Each is entirely occupied with the particular point he is expounding. In order to make it clear in the aspect in which he is regarding it, he exaggerates to such a degree that, in order to make his statement true, and often even, compatible with his own doctrine, it must be balanced by the statement of another Rabbi on the same subject made from another point of view. Apparently the Hebrew mind attains to a general grasp of truth best by this system of contradictions. At any rate, such contradictions are very common in the Old Testament and are not rare in the New Testament. Many of the conclusions formed by Gentile writers concerning Rabbinic doctrine, therefore, show extraordinarily little insight into the Jewish mind. In particular, Mr. Schechter is justly indignant with the common Gentile notion, which he attributes primarily to Weber misled by such exaggerations as have been just noticed, concerning "the transcendentalism of the Rabbinic God, and His remoteness from man." It is difficult to understand how such an error could ever have arisen; the quotations on other subjects, made incidentally in Mr. Schechter's book alone, are sufficient to prove its entire lack of foundation.

Since the subject of this book is purely theological, a more detailed notice would be out of place here. It will be sufficient to quote one or two remarkable statements, which Mr. Schechter gathers from the Rabbinical writers or quotes verbatim. In reference to the intimate relations of God with Israel, it is stated: "He acts as best man at the wedding of Adam and Eve; He 'Himself in His glory' is occupied in doing the last honours to Moses, who would otherwise have remained unburied, as no man knew his grave; He teaches Torah to Israel, and to this very day He keeps school in heaven for those who died in infancy; He prays Himself [an amazing dictum] and teaches Israel how to pray." Again, in the same sense: "He needs us as we need Him." A Rabbi, asked to reconcile the statement that the glory of God filled the tabernacle with the text, "The heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee," replied with one of those unapproachable parables distinctive of the Hebrew scriptures: "There was once a cave by the seashore, and the waves of the sea rose and filled the cave, yet were their waters not diminished. As an example of the Jews' "Joy in the Law," we are reminded of the beautiful Mosaic "Law of Forgetfulness," which orders that a sheaf of corn forgotten in the fields shall be left for the poor, and we are told of the great joy, celebrated with feasting and thank-offerings, of a certain man to whom the opportunity of obeying this law befell. It was obviously a law impossible to fulfil as long as it was in the mind. On the subject of individual responsibility and inefficacy the celebrated Hillel says: "If I am not for myself who is for me, and being for myself, what am I?" Illustrating the mercy of God, a Rabbi describes the entrances to the ways of good and evil. Before the good entrance stands the prophet Elias, inviting all to enter. The evil way has four doors in succession, guarded each by seven Angels, four within and three without. Before a man enters any of the doors, even the innermost, the three Angels entreat him long and tenderly to go back. In justifying the ceremonial law of purification, another Rabbi makes the remarkable and suggestive statement that the soul itself is polluted by anything likely to cause disgust. There are also statements curiously modern; that under the head of the Three Cardinal Sins falls "the cornering of wheat"; and that sins against chastity are caused by demoniacal possession—a more comfortable doctrine, but not universally taught. A remarkable psychological fact, the Jews' extraordinary love of idolatry, is noticed by the Rabbis, who account it a passion equally with lust, and ascribe the equally remarkable revulsion of the Jews from it since the Captivity, to the power of the earnest prayers of the Great Assembly. Two unattractive characteristics must be noticed. Many of the Rabbis fell into anthropomorphic expressions as distasteful and even ridiculous to Gentiles of the present time as Milton did. They detail long arguments between God and Moses or the Angels, in order to enhance the idea of His mercy. So severe are the Angels that God has to dig a way under His throne surreptitiously where the Angels will not see it, in order to receive the repentance of so notorious a sinner as Manasseh, King of Judah. Again, many of the Rabbis, always totally illogical, show extraordinary effrontery in their arguments. One of their favourite methods is to clench a fairly sound argument with a statement of fact invented on the spot, such as that the children of Achan were not really burnt with their father, according to the statement of that revolting incident in the book of Joshua, but merely taken to look on, for the sake of deterrent effect—an almost more revolting idea. Probably, however, the Rabbis' disquisitions were in many cases partially rhetorical lessons; at any rate, the statement of a single Rabbi was binding on no one, and their exaggerated emphasis was understood by their hearers much better than it is now. Notwithstanding its deficiencies, the body of Rabbinic theology remains of equal authority among the Jews with the Scriptures, and in many respects softens and humanises the Law of Moses.

THE NORTHERN HILLS

Motor Tours in Yorkshire. By MRS. RODOLPH STAWELL. (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s. net.)

It is pleasant, having regard to the outcry which has been raised of late years against motorists and their inconsiderate ways, to find that a few possessors of cars are doing their best to prove to what good effect the advantages of speed can be used. Travel-books are appearing in large numbers nowadays, a fair proportion of them coming from ladies who are almost as competent with the pen as they are at the steering-wheel, and, as far as they are not mere gossip results of that fierce desire to rush into irresponsible print, which seems likely to be a most amazing and regrettable characteristic of the present period, they may be encouraged. We do not remember seeing anything better in its way than Mrs. Stawell's volume dealing with Yorkshire—a county as rich in history as it is in natural beauties.

The book is divided into four portions: "The Dales," "The Coast," "Chiefly Old Churches," "York and the South," and each is written with a care which betrays a love of the district far surpassing that of the fugitive tourist. If at times there is a flavour of the guide-book style about an occasional paragraph—"turning to the left we find the castle looking down upon us gloomily," and so on—we freely admit that such a fault is very difficult to avoid when describing a particular part of the country, and the author fully atones for a few slight lapses by her copious and illuminating remarks on the history of each place of note. This, indeed, is the strong attribute of her book—the scenery takes a secondary position, and the motor is hardly intruded at all. Mrs. Stawell tells of Lord Clifford, "surnamed the Butcher," and Margaret of Anjou; of Oliver Cromwell at Knaresborough; of King Alfred, who made Ripon a royal borough, and instituted a custom which prevails even to-day:

He it was who ordained that every night a horn should be blown by the wakeman, and that anyone who was robbed between the blowing of the horn and the hour of sunrise should be repaid by the townsfolk. From his day to ours each night at nine o'clock the men of Ripon have heard the horn—three long, penetrating blasts before the town hall and three before the wakeman's house. Several centuries ago the wakeman became the mayor, and now he blows the horn by deputy.

Of Mary Queen of Scots and Bolton Castle; of Whitby Abbey and its story; Piers Gaveston and Scarborough Castle; of Fountains Abbey, Rievaulx, Beverley Minster, and York, with their legends, we have glimpses in these pages. The chapter on the York of the present day is extremely interesting and full of acute appreciation:

No man knows the spell of York till he has approached it by road in the evening. Of all the fresh experiences that the motor-car has brought to us there are few from which the imagination gains so much as from this way of entering old and beautiful towns. We have too long accepted the roof of a railway station as our first view of such places. It is not an inspiring view. But to see York Minster from afar, shining under the evening sky and lifted high above the city; to watch it growing larger and larger, rising higher and higher, increasing in beauty every moment, until at last one drives slowly into its huge shadow; to pass under one of the great gates that have survived so many centuries, so many wars, so many pageants, that have welcomed so many kings, and dripped with the blood of so many warriors; to see the ancient streets for the first time idealised by the dusk of twilight will help us, if anything will, to recall and realise something of what York has been during the eighteen hundred years of her history.

Although the scenic beauties of the county are not the main feature of these "tours," the author has an eye for them. Hastening from Whitby to Scarborough, she says:

The road lies visible in front of us for miles; at times so straight that the telegraph wires are foreshortened till the posts are hardly distinguishable one from another; at other times winding in serpentine curves into the far distance. On each side of us, from the wheels of the hurrying car to the horizon, stretches the heather. Here and there is a patch of bracken, now and then a strip of yellow grass; but it is heather that makes the landscape, that flings its imperial robes over the hills and nestles under the wayside stones, that satisfies the eye and rests the heart with its astonishing beauty. Miles of road fly under us; we glide up and we dart down; now we dip into a ferny dell and climb out of it again, now we cross a stony beck, now we pass a plantation of firs; but still the setting is heather, deep bell-heather and pale ling, purple and crimson and mauve, sweeping away till the colours are merged in blue. Bluest of all is the sea, which appears now and then in a triangle of sapphire at the end of a glen.

A neat contrast is drawn between Tintern Abbey and Rievaulx:

At Tintern the feeling of Cistercian seclusion can only be acquired through the imagination; a high road is close at hand; a brisk trade in picture postcards and Goss china is carried on at the abbey door; to be alone is almost impossible. But here at Rievaulx we may chance to stand in perfect solitude, perfect stillness, under the mighty archway that soars in dignified simplicity so far above our heads, and separates us as though by invisible gates from the world. . . . There is something here that is more than beauty; the very air seems charged with the prayers of holy men long dead.

The section devoted to the coast is perhaps the best, and we are inclined to place that treating of York next in honour; each reader, however, forming his own opinion will arrive at the same ultimate verdict: that the whole volume, with its numerous excellent photographs, forms a welcome and valuable addition to the literature of the English counties.

LAUSANNE

Lausanne. Painted by J. HARDWICKE LEWIS and MAY HARDWICKE LEWIS; described by FRANCIS GRIBBLE. (Black, 7s. 6d.)

THERE seems to be of late years an inclination to return to the "picture book" stage of literature, and on the question as to whether it is altogether a good sign of the times or not we do not feel quite certain. The untravelled like to see by painting and photography the places they have never visited and probably never can visit; the more fortunate wish to possess pretty reminders of pleasant sojourns abroad; and from this point of view there can be no objection to the "colour" books which form so definite a feature of present-day publishing. But from the higher standpoint of art we imagine that their popularity is not wholly beneficial. The stage has not yet been reached when the processes of reproduction in colour can satisfy the critical eye, and unless the appreciation is considerably weighted by a pleasant accompaniment of literary performance the average book of this description does not stand very high in a level-headed judgment of its worth.

Fortunately the one before us takes its place among the best examples, being strongly fortified by Mr. Gribble's interesting monograph on the town of Lausanne and its associations. Gibbon, of course, is the first name that occurs to the mind when Lausanne is mentioned, and of his curious career, his work, his extraordinary love-story with Madame Necker, both before and after her marriage, we have a capital summary; Mr. Gribble might naturally be expected not to miss this opportunity, being such a specialist in the amorous adventures of literary celebrities. His accomplishments and shortcomings as a critic we noted in reviewing his book on Rousseau a few months ago; he is perhaps at his best in a work of this character, where a light, facile touch is desirable rather than any specially eminent critical equipment. Of Benjamin Constant and his entanglements with Madame de Staël and other notorious ladies—these being all slightly relative to the vicinity of Lausanne—there is also a pleasing account; and many other well-known names appear. Mr. Gribble would have done better, however, to devote more space to the town as it is to-day; such modern matter and comment as he does give is excellent, and a few additional pages would have been an advantage. The arrangement of the chapters might have been revised with advantage—the last three dealing with history, should have taken their place symmetrically in the earlier portion of the book; as it is, the modern part is sandwiched between two literary and historical sections somewhat incongruously. As to the illustrations, they are quite up to the usual standard of Messrs. Black's celebrated series, and not much more need be said about them. Some are a trifle crude and hard—evidently exigencies of reproduction are to blame for this; others are very successful; "Lausanne from the Signal" and "Lutry" are exceptionally good. Two or three the artists must have been sorry to see perpetuated; but, as we have suggested, the deficiency makes no aspersions on their skill and sense of beauty. As a gift-book, "Lausanne" ranks highly both in this way and by reason of its literary credentials.

TWO PRETENDERS

Dromina. By JOHN AYS COUGH. (J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol, 6s.)

THE reader whose first experience of Mr. John Ayscough's skill as a novelist was gained by a perusal of "Mr. Beke of the Blacks" might easily have doubts as to whether "Dromina" was written by the same hand. The charm of humour and of sure delineation of character is here, as in the previous book, but the effective simplicity of "Mr. Beke" is forsaken for a plot with so many people in it and so many relationships that some little confusion is caused in the reader's mind—a confusion which is not lessened by the author's occasional artifice of taking a rearward survey en passant of events in the lives of his actors which have become past history. Steadfast attention, therefore, is demanded if the story is to be rightly understood; presuming this, those who have admired Mr. Ayscough's distinction and facility in the two different styles of "Marotz" and its successor will find that his hand loses not a whit of its cunning in the present volume.

"Dromina" is the name of the castle, or perhaps we should say the estate, in Connaught, from which the author centres the first half of his narrative; having remarked this, it hardly needs to be said that we are at once in the midst of a group of extremely interesting individuals whose fortunes we follow solicitously. The person, or personage, who for a great part of the book takes the leading position is known as "King" Ludovic, the ostensible ruler of a tribe of aristocratic gypsies which has encamped not far from Dromina, and Mr. Ayscough has cleverly introduced into his scheme the mystery of the lost Dauphin. Roma, the old gypsy woman who really reigns over the camp, is responsible for his youth, and a quotation will set the matter clearly:

Early in the year 1795 she was in France. . . . The camp to which she belonged was in the forest of Fontainebleau, and thither one evening a child was brought and confided to her care. He had been kidnapped from his infamous guardians a week or two before, but so strict a search was being silently made for him, that those who had saved him were in daily terror of his being discovered and treated, if that were conceivable, worse than ever. . . . The notion of hiding him among the gypsies had then occurred to his ever-alarmed partisans, and they had very soon acted upon it. The event had answered their expectations, for no search for him among the Romany folk had ever been dreamed of, and presently it was given out officially that the Dauphin had died on June 8th, 1795. That the child was Charles Louis Bourbon, Duke of Normandy, Dauphin since is brother's death in 1789, Roma had been carefully informed. . . . It had seemed to her highly unsafe that he should remember too much, and she had persistently taught him to consider himself what he might safely be—a gypsy child.

She tells him his story when he arrives at manhood, and plots to make him a king in reality. He marries Ethna, eldest daughter of the M'Moroghs, of Dromina, and deteriorates sadly later on; in fact, he almost drops out of the story. Other love affairs of the two boys, Henry and Carthage, form principal points in the book. To enter into details of the three or four chief characters and their fortunes would be quite impossible in a brief review; there are many subsidiary persons, also, whose travels and adventures occupy considerable space.

In the latter part of the book the young son of Henry comes to the front as self-constituted emperor of the island of San Diego. Here, to the reader's surprise, the scene changes and the story assumes a totally different quality—intrigue and escape, torture and death, enter into the theme quite in the cape-and sword manner. In fact we are compelled to observe that Mr. Ayscough seems to us to have given too freely of his good things, or too indiscriminately; it is an artistic error to finish the book on such a completely altered plane from that of the beginning. There is material for at least two good stories here, the second of which could have taken its place as a sequel to the first. It seems rather ungrateful, however, to stigmatise this generosity as a fault, in view of the depressing paucity of equipment which spoils so much modern fiction, and we hasten to indicate, in conclusion, one quality which can hardly be overlooked by any critical reader. Mr. Ayscough's use of mysticism in matters both religious and secular is delicate and beautiful. He excels in this; there is a scene poignant and tender, where Conn, the little cripple youth, regains the power to walk, which neither strikes the improbable note nor offends the strictest good taste, and continually in the progress of the story the fine sense of things beyond our ken is evident. As to the literary style of "Dromina," we recollect reading from Mr. Ayscough's pen of an old schoolmaster of his, "who was devoted to the subject of philology and everything to do with language." That old schoolmaster's efforts on one pupil, at any rate, have not been wasted.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Key of Life. By A. A. METHLEY. (Unwin, 6s.)

THE central idea of this story is not an attractive one. An Englishman has disappeared mysteriously—in reality has been captured by Arabs, and for ten years nothing whatever is heard of him. Then by chance an English doctor encounters him, and writes the news to the girl who has waited faithful to his memory at home. She goes out to Egypt, all eager anticipation, to find a blind, querulous wreck of a man instead of the lover of her tender imaginings. There is, of course, the third person to this problem in the shape of a Major, a fine fellow, who falls in love with the woman and whose love is returned. The story is well written, with a punctuation which is somewhat too profuse in commas, and it comes to a happy ending; there is nothing to distinguish it from the swarm of other novels, but it will please many readers by its description of the scenery of the Nile and by the ingenious elaboration of its theme.

A Forsaken Garden. By JESSIE AINSWORTH DAVIS. (John Long, 6s.)

It is impossible to deny to this novel a certain distinction, despite the frequently careless and indifferent writing of its author. It is planned on a large scale, and there is an almost epic intensity about all the characters. The element of tragedy, indeed, is almost too insistent. One wearies for a momentary break in the monotony of sorrow and suffering. But Mrs. Davis is a relentless and inexorable novelist, and her puppets—though, to be fair, they are something more than puppets—have to "dree their weird" to the bitter end.

The central motive of this story is by no means new. It is a variant on the old, familiar, triangular tragedy. Two women and a man, a momentary misunderstanding, and the seeming waste of three lives—of all this we have read before, not once or twice. Mrs. Davis, however, invests the well-worn theme with a certain charm of novelty, and in the central figure—Nora Ainger, the winsome Irish girl, afterwards Mère Marie Gerard, the Ursuline nun—she has given us a fine study in the beauty and nobility of self-renunciation.

Love and Battles. By FRANK SIDGWICK. (Andrew Melrose, 6s.)

MR. ANDREW MELROSE has successfully demonstrated that one of the best ways to secure good fiction for a publishing house is by means of a prize competition. The prospect of 250 guineas is always a tempting bait, and, in the case of Mr. Melrose's competition, it must have induced many mute, inglorious Merediths (let us say) to inquire of themselves: "Why have I never written a novel?" It appears, at any rate, to have induced Mr. Frank Sidgwick to turn aside from his accustomed paths of poetical criticism, where he has but few competitors, to that broad highway of fiction, where (in these days of free education) practically everybody is a competitor. The result is remarkable. Mr. Sidgwick has shown us that he, the editor of ballads, the Elizabethan savant, can challenge nine novelists out of ten, and beat them at their own game. "Love and Battles" is as delightful a novel as we have met with for many a long day—whimsical, humorous, yet with a hint, here and there, of the profundities, and with an unflinching insight into the springs of human conduct. It is, needless to say, the work of a literary man, and the little tags of poetry in every chapter betray the ruling passion. Mr. Sidgwick's characters—most of them, at least—read, and what they read they discuss, so that we have a great deal of very sound and subtle criticism artfully insinuated in the form of dialogue. This, in strict accordance with the tradition of the elders, is rank heresy to the moderns. Nevertheless, the novel—which ideally is a reflection of life—is too big a thing to be judged by any predetermined canons of criticism.

The architectonics of the book—to use Matthew Arnold's hideous word—are undeniably faulty. It is almost bewilderingly discursive, and it is some time before the reader can settle down and realise his position. With the arrival of Tony Bargrave, the hero, however, he attains a fixed centre of interest. Tony serves as a beacon light amidst the ever-changing scenes. We meet him first at Rugby, and there are some charming pictures of English public school life. Indeed, we are not sure that these earlier chapters are not the best in the book. Then there is the first awakening of love in the inflammable breast of our hero, and the straits into which this too-quickly kindled passion lead him. By the time we leave him, Tony, a man of twenty-six, has acquired much wisdom in the bracing school of rejection. He has sloughed much of his sentiment. The amorist has become almost a philosopher. In the meantime there is much diverting by-play. The book, it might be objected, is lacking in a central motive. Its title—"Love and Battles"—describes it admirably. But as a presentation of temperament it is supremely successful, and one can only hope that Mr. Sidgwick will go on to give us more novels of equal interest.

Royal Palaces of Spain. By A. F. CALVERT. (John Lane, 3s. 6d.)

OUR English Royal residences seem rather uninteresting and stolid after the glimpses of these Spanish Palaces, which Mr. Calvert now adds to his famous "Spanish Series," but the clearer air and the less rigorous climate undoubtedly works its subtle spell on architects and fashioners of stone as it does on poets and painters. Spain is unusually rich in gorgeous buildings, many of them, too, with memories of stirring and momentous events in her history, as the author notes in his preface:

On the gloomy pile of the Escorial—worthier of an Egyptian Pharaoh—Philip II. stamped conspicuously and indelibly his own sombre personality; Aranjuez and La Granja reveal to us monarchy in its lighter aspect; the Alcazar reminds us of the days when Castilian royalty aped the pomp of the Saracen and became itself half-Oriental; the Royal Palace of Madrid epitomises the greatest crisis in the nation's history, of the expulsion of its legitimate sovereign and of the usurpation of the eldest Buonaparte.

Readers whose taste does not lie in the regions of decorative art and historic associations will probably find the chapter devoted to King Alfonso's modern residence at Miramar one of the most interesting in this volume. The young King seems a favourite with all classes:

At San Sebastian the dignity and restraint of royalty is largely relaxed, and the English visitor realises more clearly than in any other part of the country how intensely democratic is the Spaniard at heart. The King of Spain is more in touch with the masses of his people than the ruler of any other European nation. He is an anointed sovereign and the most august personage in the land; but he is a Spaniard, he belongs to his people, he is one of themselves. In Madrid Court etiquette keeps the sovereign at a different altitude from his subjects, but here he rides and drives abroad, generally unattended, and sets an example of princely amiability and unaffected kindness which distinguishes all ranks of the Spanish nobility. The line of demarcation between the nobles and the people is so clearly defined that it never has to be emphasised. In their relations there is no unbending on the one side, there is no servility on the other. A grandee of Spain does not imperil his dignity by joining the cotillon at the Casino; a duchess can drink tea at the crowded tables of a public café without taking thought of appearances.

To describe adequately even one of the older palaces, such as the Escorial with all its treasures, would occupy a volume of many hundreds of pages, but the author is able to supplement the short account of that magnificent national possession which he gave us in his book on Madrid (reviewed in these columns a fortnight ago) by a slightly more extensive treatment. "Philip of Spain"—he of whose "great fleet invincible" Macaulay wrote, and who in schooldays was invariably bracketed with that same Armada—is the subject of a neat little character-study in the first few pages. Stern and laborious, an intense individualist, "an ecstatic ascetic," he seems to have expressed himself in this huge rectangular palace to which he gave more than twenty years of unrelenting interest:

This was the man who in the leisure of thirty years of his life stamped his individuality upon the Royal Palace and Monastery of the Escorial, and fashioned this mighty pile to be a monument to his power and a revelation of his mind—a mind diseased with that virus of morbidity which turned from the contemplation of mercy, charity, and love, to ponder on the awful and retributive side of religion. The man explains the edifice, and the edifice is the picture of the man.

In his other chapters, which deal with less famous palaces, Mr. Calvert is no less successful, allowing for exigencies of space. The plates, numbering 164, are good; our remarks upon those in the previous volume apply equally to these, with the reservation that not so many in the present book suffer from the drawbacks inevitable to reduction. The "Spanish Series" is growing to quite a surprising length, but we are pleased to find that it maintains the level of excellence, volume by volume, which characterised its first appearance.

Salome and the Head. By E. NESBIT. (Alston Rivers.)

IF this utterly fantastic and improbable story is intended as an exposition of the art of the young lady who turned the heads of an appreciable portion of London's population a few months ago, it has arrived rather late in the day; and if it is intended as a serious romance we are compelled to say that Mrs. Bland has failed to give her incidents and her characters that semblance of reality without which the finest plot becomes dull and lifeless. The title of her book announces clearly enough her subject, and the opening chapters promise well—are, indeed, something of a woodland idyll, albeit they are sadly weakened by an indefensible colloquial style, a "buttonholing" of the reader for silly confidential remarks, which is simply irritating and useless. A sentence or two will illustrate the fault:

Edmund Templar, Corporal in the C.I.V. I implore you to check your uneasy surmises: I give you my word of honour that there are no veldts or kopjes or Boers in my pages. . . . Have courage, and read on. There is no fighting in the story, and it all happened in England. Most of it is very romantic, and some of it is rather horrible. If Edmund Templar, who is, I scorn to deny it, my hero, goes to South Africa, he goes alone. We will not, I pledge you my honour, go with him. . . . Of course you guessed, as soon as I had mentioned nymphs, that Mr. Templar would come upon a girl dancing in the forest. That was just because the story is called Salome—and of course you knew it would be about a dancer . . . etc., etc.

This sort of writing, except in nursery tales, is neither clever nor amusing; it is simply bad taste; only two or three living novelists can achieve the personal touch with success. Later on in the story the idyllic prettiness degenerates into the crudest sensationalism, and for a sheer pertinacity of gruesomeness the account of the "head" would be difficult to outdo. If we merely mention that a man is murdered, his head cut off, and actually used on the stage of the "Hilarity" by Sylvia, the heroine; that the man is her husband; that no details of the horrible scenes are spared—even the decapitated corpse is described—our readers will see that it is unnecessary for us to insist on the glaring absurdity of the whole thing; it is the kind of mixture one might expect to find between the lurid covers of a penny-dreadful. It is not artistry; it is neither realism nor idealism; it is a lamentable futility. We are sorry for Mr. Stewart Headlam, who (in the book) "clapped his hands sore from the stalls" at the vision of Sylvia's performance; Mrs. Bland's friends will hardly be pleased at seeing this fiery and genial gentleman's name in such discreditable pages. We are sorry, too, for the author herself, who can but damage her reputation by this story after the excellent and delicate work which she has done. There seems to us to be no possible reason why "Salome" should not have been maintained upon the level of the passable introductory chapters; the wilful and nauseating intrusion of the horrors at which we have hinted merely mars a plot that, apart from them, is rather neat. Extraneous matters, too, such as a taxi-cab driver, who uses French tags, falls in love with Sylvia, and is permitted to kiss her, do not add anything to the reader's pleasure:

"Good-bye," she said. And in that moment of gratitude to him for what he had not said, she loved him. She looked at him a little wildly, and held out her hands. He took them, kissed them gently, and gently let them fall. It was then that she suddenly put her hands on his shoulders and kissed him.

"Dear child—dear, foolish child!" he said, "that was good of you. I shall remember that—as long as I live. You're very brave, very fine, very generous. You're sure you love that man?" he said. "I've no right to ask, but I must ask."

"Yes," she said. "Oh! of course I love him. Oh! I am sorry. Oh! I wish there were two of me," said she, "for then I should love you too."

Of course, this chaffeur turns out to be a "Honourable" who is "wanted," and, to save Sylvia, he gives himself up to the police as the man who has "committed the murder." He is freed from that charge, but we believe that after he has finished his term of imprisonment for the previous offence Sylvia rewards him, according to the final sentences with their rather unfortunate allusion to a "Chinese lantern":

But sometimes it happens that a man coming out of hell finds heaven waiting for him—hands that implore his hands—a face that his coming illuminates, as a candle lights up a Chinese lantern—eyes that see nothing in the world but his face—a heart that beats to a tune of wild gladness. And all that his long prison life has painted for him as lost for ever, out of reach, out of hope, is waiting for him in the chill, sweet morning, waiting with arms held out, saying: "Take me, for I am thine."

So it is hardly fair, perhaps, to call the chauffeur "extraneous matter" after all. We have said nothing of Templar, the lover, nor of the heroine's secret marriage; the fact is that the book is unpleasant and incoherent, and it would be useless to dwell on its defects further; they will be sufficiently obvious to any reader with a literary sense who glances at the quotations we have given. The unpleasantness comes as a disappointment, and from a careful perusal of the volume, appraising it as charitably as may be, most readers will find themselves echoing our own question: Why was the extraordinary effusion ever written?

AN OUTDOOR BRIEVIARY—III.

THE hedgerows are budding as suddenly as the staff of Tannhäuser, after the sweet and temperate season of an early April. The tide of green begins to flow, like the stream of moonlight when the moon's disc is still below the horizon. There is a distinct change in colour in the grass. From an apparently flowerless patch a faint and most pure moist breath seems to exhale and pause and move with the liquid air. It is the greenish starry plume of ransoms whose olive leaves smell so rank when rubbed or plucked. The purplish heads of ground ivy, thick in every hedge, have a sweet familiar pungency of their own; and as in George Fox's description of his own mystical experience when he came up in spirit through the flaming sword into the Paradise, "All things were new and all creation gave another smell unto me than before, beyond what words can utter."

"Colour is no mere delightful quality of natural things, but a spirit upon them by which they become expressive to the spirit," and the spring in England seems to lose one of its notes, because among all its yellows and whites and blues it has not the red, the rose-colour of Eastern spring-time, when the Syrian women bore the image of Tammuz to burial in the sea, while the red anemone, his flower, bloomed among the cedars, and the rivers ran down red to the sea, staining it with a fringe of reddened surf.

"C'est parce que la statue de Memnon était brisée qu'elle rendait un son à l'aurore."

The tall, perpendicular wall of the east front of the ruins streams up high in the cool shadows, with both its lateral towers cloaked in ivy. In the centre, the small Renaissance doorway, with the Saviour's head, and its inscription:

Sub numine tuo
Stet genus et domus

gemmed with ferns, and approached by olive-mossed, worn, irregular steps, opens into a greenish sun-mottled gloom within. In the hexagonal court, the tall ochre-spotted wall rises up steeply to the blue sky stretched over it, the bluer for the well-like rim of the compassing wall, within which the colour is deepened and, as it were, concentrated; and underfoot in the middle of the court is the dry well sunk during the famous siege.

The outer walls are starred with powdery grey and orange rosettes of lichen or hid by blocks of ivy, whose scraping, light-pricked leaves ripple in the wind. Here a window-cranny is set with white, seeded grasses, and the lower wall is green for about two feet with moss, while along the lines of the mortar, among the mosses, creep mauve-flowered periwinkles, nettles, and ivy with its snake-like plaited stems.

Upon the smooth plat of grass, the east front limns itself, taller than life, in shadow-ruin, with the intolerable sun "growing and fading and growing upon it without sound," from one of the two tall pointed windows of the banqueting-hall.

C'est parce que la statue de Memnon était brisée qu'elle rendait un son à l'aurore.

The shrubbery that skirts the mounded grassy platform of the castle, soft to tread as down, with its springs of grey moss, is lit with the sparse crimson flower of the rhododendron and the new leaves of the syringa. The pale columnar stem of the ironwood tree, rooted by a ruined wall, is just breaking into russet elm-like leaves, fine as dust and pale, while near is the sun-bleached trunk of a fallen cedar, stripped of its bark and faintly pungent; near it an elder is feathered with green, and two dusky spires of cypress, with grey-skinned stems, pierce the blue sky like a dial finger; their pointed shadow drowsing on the crisp grey-mossed grass. It is more beautiful than a house with door and key and window and latch; for "the wrinkle of a fig is a seasonable beauty: the olive is at its best in putrefaction."

The thunder mutters from an opaque cloud upon which the pale-edged trees show with the brightness of burnished metal, and the fork lightning stretches between them like a wire, and then snaps. The thick grasses are bent with the rain, the white florets of the wild parsley are beaten in the slotted, fragrant dust, and a blast tears away the pale green oak-leaves and tosses them upon the field and the road; but the incommunicable beauty of lightning brings a sense of sharp wonder, which darts upon the mind with an almost physical sensation, as if one had drunk strange waters

This morning had a cold grey cloud, with a watery amber seam below it. Then, suddenly, "from the great cloud a fire unfolding itself, and a brightness was about it, and out of the midst thereof as the colour of amber, out of the midst of the fire. And behold the day, behold it is come: the morning is gone forth, the rod hath blossomed, pride hath budded. And the cherubims lifted up their wings and mounted up from the earth in my sight; and everyone stood at the door of the east gate of the Lord's House."

"Siro te amari, Pulchrihido, tem antiqua et tam nova, sero te amari."

May—singular month, "a soure time and a sweete time, both sweete in promise and soure in fulfilment. And because the time of roses delayeth, so much the more shall we appraise her sournesse, which is but the sure conduct to fulfilment in time appointed. For as the months tread in their round each of yem stealeth or giveth to the other—upon a certaine compacte, and so doth Maye, of her sournesse, pay tribute to flowery June that followeth on her heels."

It is the season when "the warmth of the land is not hot and the coolth of it is not cold," when the air is cooler for moving about the innumerable limp leaves with their birth dew still upon them as for moving over water. A brown bird flies over the shaven grass of the water-meadow across the river where a white horse is drawing a jingling mowing machine, and into the green thorns by the path where the pale, wafer-like scales from the trees, spring's confetti, lie flatly in the dust. Upon one side of the path is a ditch, covered with flat, even-laid duckweed, where the tree-shadows lie sharply bitten; upon the other side winds the greyish-green river, which throws its reflected light all day to flutter like a moth upon the silver-flaked birch that arches one member across the water. From its creviced bark, a grey gnat moves out faintly and dizzily, like a convalescent, or a muttering bee sails through the lattice of thorns to the sparse dandelion-heads or the uncrumpling greenish umbels of parsley in the meadow.

In smooth reaches the trees are painted in greenish-grey upon the glaze of the water, which has, even at its steadiest, an ever-flowing wind-blur breaking it, and is fretted with rippling circles from a flapping fish, or pricked with insect-life as finely as with slender needles. The sun, too, is pictured down there, shorn of its beams, but even so the very eye of light is unapt to be looked on, an intolerable circle; and as one looks too long a tingling wafer of darkness creeps over him. On the water, too, lie the green scales the trees have cast; some of them have a little scarlet grain, like a seed of blood and pain embedded in them.

Many of the willow-trees in this water-walk are bent and broken, or have lost their best limbs, but the smell of the sap of their uncrumpling leaves is as sweet as that of the merest whip of a sapling with twenty new leaves upon it; and the secular thorns, whose branches are like knobs of iron-work, are hanging their "verdures" in the windy house of Spring, through whose rents and gaps shine the blue city towers, the glossy meadow, and the glaze of the water.

The most estimable quality of water is that it is nearly everywhere in communication with the open sun; his melting disc lies somewhere upon the face of all water; shallow and profound, they are charged with suns "carrying that remote fire, as it were, within their unalterable freshness," or turning it into pale slips of light that float upon the surface as flakes of gold float in the giyōbu nashiji lacquer.

SLEEP

THE mind of man, to a certain extent, is inherently poetic, instinctively distrustful of too plain or too heartless an explanation of such intangible phenomena as minister to his sense of beauty or pleasure. We are told that the conflagration of a sunset is caused by the unequal refraction of rays of light, aided by varying densities of atmosphere, smoke, reflection from edges of cloud, absorption of specified colours of the spectrum, and so on; and we accept the scientist's well-meant remarks, with the reservation that there is something about the sunset still unexplained. A musician plays to us a nocturne or a prelude of Chopin, or we hear an orchestra render some immortal symphony, and we are perfectly aware that certain arrangements of wood and wire have vibrated, certain strings, reeds and manufactured brass instruments have uttered notes whose wave-lengths can be measured and whose relationships have been adjusted; yet what secret influence thrilled the sound, so that some fugitive spirit leaned toward us for a few moments, whispering unutterable things, and stirring the fount of tears? The distant lightning shimmers palely over the sea, as if some huge moon-mirror were being playfully twirled by giants below the horizon, and we experience a vague resentment at being informed that it is merely the silent equalisation of electric tension between the earth and a cloud. The wind blows through the firs, but there is a voice in the wind; the tiny waterfall trickles into a moorland pool—but it bears elfin undertones to which we can listen without weariness.

The sense of mystery extends to our more intimate, familiar surroundings and customs—even to ourselves—and the temporary annihilation of sleep is perhaps the greatest mystery of all. Most people, did they confess it, would like to know what happens—"where they go"—during sleep, and the elucidations of the specialist regarding recuperation of brain-cells, restoration of energy, with a casual reference to metabolism and anabolism, seem painfully impertinent and to savour of prevarication, having to do with the body, and not at all with the suspension of personality which induced the question. It is just that suspension of personality which makes such an eerie affair of the seven or eight hours wherein, if we are fortunate, we lie motionless and prone. Twenty, thirty, forty minutes before we slept we were alive, alert, sitting by the fire with our book or talking with a friend. Then came a quiet mist stealing over the brain, a subtle slackening of attention to the printed page, a furtive glance at the clock when—not to hurt his feelings—our companion was looking another way; followed a faint pricking of the eyelids, a yawn which for heartiness might match with Teufelsdröckh's volcanic laughter, and a mighty stretch that relieved our very shoulder-blades. So, with languid "Good-nights" to whomsoever they were due, we dawdled meditatively upstairs, and fumbled off our clothes, thinking drowsily perhaps of how blissful and benignant it was to feel so comfortably tired. And ere the cool thrill of the soft sheets was fairly past, while yet we heard hazily the clip-clop of a belated hansom or the skirl of a motor, our five servitors who had so unwearily stood at beck and call all day struck work, composed themselves as though never again should we have need of them, and slumbered; and, since we are of little use without them, we, too, sank into oblivion. . . .

We woke in the morning to find that Time had had no idea of sleeping—that, in fact, he had let slip several of his winged hours with uncommonly light burdens as far as we were concerned; and in the business of giving the next fifteen or sixteen a double share the mystery was forgotten. "Morning brings back the heroic ages."

No mistress was ever wooed so assiduously, so constantly, nor in so many ways as sleep—and not always in the darkness of the night is she sought. We all know the friend who dozes after dinner, whose head droops gradually until, with several false starts, he nods like a mandarin, looks round suspiciously, and begins again. He is continually climbing the fence into dreamland, and continually slipping down. We love better him who with benevolent smile frankly spreads the silken square over his face, thrusts his hands deeply into his pockets, stretches until gravity slides his portly body into the responsive leathern hollows (well, the chair knows his ways!) and gives himself, unabashed by surreptitious giggles of restive juniors, to the comfortable hour. We remember, too, a gentleman of a certain worldly distinction, who found himself one blithe summer's day in the woods by a silvery-running stream; the picnic basket was lightened, and the other members of the party had dispersed. He chose with care a fine grassy mound beneath a beech-tree, extended himself deliberately, and, with the protective handkerchief to frustrate intrusive midges, slept—slept gloriously and not inaudibly. And the baser sort, passing his place of rest, scorned aloud the man who could do such a thing: "Fancy," said they, with ironic smiles, "coming out here to sleep!" They saw but superficially, not understanding that his was the worship of Nature's best admirer; to him came consolation, peace, and that delightful somnolence which only a tranquil mind and a healthy body can compass. The business man who can take a nap out of doors, lulled by the song of birds, the murmur of bees, the rustle of wind in heather or fern, and wake with a long breath to the sunlight, the dancing shadows, the gold and green and blue of earth and heaven, is likely to be one for whom life is no haphazard gift to be lightly handled or wasted.

Those who cannot sleep well have been pitied in every age. "Wearisome nights are appointed to me," complained Job; "when I lie down, I say, When shall I arise, and the night be gone? and I am full of tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day. . . . When I say, My bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint, then thou scarest me with dreams, and terriest me through visions." To lie awake for an hour or two, free from pain, able to think clearly in the lowered tension of the night—this is not a hardship; but to "shoulder all the weapons of black Insomnia's armoury"—to be tired, with aching head or aching heart, and to long unspeakably for the unfathomable, refreshing unconsciousness of sleep; to know only the drifting, intermittent, uneasy hour, disturbed even then by dreams—such forms the tragedy of many a life. For the night should be a neutral ground, whereon truce is proclaimed for the armies of the day; a bridge, guarded by silent sentinels. If in dreams we fight again in the warfare with phantom soldiers, still hear the ringing echoes of the clash of arms, the bridge of sleep is undefended; it becomes a battlefield harder and more grim by reason of the sombre, soundless spaces that envelope it so profoundly. And in the morning—the morning which should find us fronting the world in excellent fashion—the enemies we may meet will discover, if not a craven opponent, at least one whose armour is weakened, whose resistance is half-hearted, while the friends we are sure to meet will wonder at our lacklustre eyes, our pallid countenance, our listless demeanour, our uninspired remarks:

From this unrest, lo, early wreck'd,
A Future staggers crazy,
Ophelia of the Ages, deck'd
With woeful weed and daisy.

The day's work will leave us exhausted and glum, the geniality of evening will give place to irritation, and quite possibly our replies will become retorts, our retorts sarcasms, our sarcasms sneers, to the collapse of a whole world of happiness—someone else's happiness—in pitiful ruins.

Day by day to do one's work, and to know at night-fall that it has been well done, that perhaps it has helped others to do theirs; to quit us like men, whether roused by factory hooter or friendly farmyard sounds or noises of the city—such satisfaction is doomed by a mere lost night's rest. So, with the mystery still unsolved, we are bound to conclude that he who spends the night in dreamless slumber works best, loves best, and can, if he will, serve God and his fellow-men with the success that derives from energies undiminished and a tranquil mind.

CORRESPONDENCE

TUBERCULOSIS.—WASHINGTON AND LONDON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I attended the Tuberculosis Congress in Washington in the autumn of 1908. Those of us who were listeners listened to men whose names in science were great enough to attract 5,000 delegates to a five days' series of serious lectures. The delegates were scientists. One met the intellectual and rather intelligent German, the very intelligent American, the Englishman presenting valuable facts with precision and without ornament, the Frenchman eloquently grave, the Hungarian with all the vivacity and none of the gravity of the French, and the educated Russian with no characteristics of his own. The time at the disposal of the Congress at Washington was too short, the lectures were authoritative, they were luminous, and, alas! for the chairmen and timekeepers, they were seldom brief. Yet there were many sections, and the subjects and the celebrities were well chosen and well distributed. Everyone was pleased, we all felt we were concerned in a great and successful gathering. All the nations had Anglo-Saxon appetites and shared an intellectual interest in the benefit to mankind, together with an appreciative gratitude for American hospitality. Much knowledge was obtained and many menu cards. The American Government had directed that one of the largest of the public buildings should be used for the Congress, and even then the Government had fallen short of the wishes of the American people, for the Press showed a genuine chagrin that the Capitol itself had not been chosen. An exhibition philanthropic and educational of the modern means for dealing with tuberculosis was arranged with a marvel of attractiveness. As far as its attractiveness was concerned, never before had one seen anything so well done. The general public accepted the invitation to attend and at every corner demonstrators (fluent speakers) spoke, in language understood of the people, of the disease which dogs civilisation. And in the quieter lecture rooms one met Koch, Von Pirquet, Arloing, Calmette, Destré, Phillips, Newsholme, and men of equal stature.

The Congress formed a most serious effort to standardise the knowledge collected during the last years, knowledge by which consumption will be lessened and some day abolished. What were the subjects brought before this great gathering? Tuberculosis as it strikes at you, at me, at everyone; the disease as it rules in the home, as it steals into the schoolroom, as it thrusts into the workshop; the disease as it meets a man in his bedroom, as it meets him at his table, at his desk, in the tramcar, in the railway train, even in the theatre and the church. The disease has been carefully stalked in our big cities. In New York, as an instance, blocks of buildings have been found to be death traps; there are even blocks known as "lung blocks," also blocks of buildings have been found to be free from the disease. As with blocks, so with districts; some districts are full, some districts are as free from disease as the Saturday Review from rancour. The conditions which lead to disease are discovered or are being discovered. We learnt of the disease in cattle as well as in man; of the disease in the wild and the tame; we learnt of the possibility of transference from one animal to another, or from animal to man. We discussed the varying virulence of the "Bacillus" towards differing races, its deadliness to the black man fresh from his forest bed of leaves; its mildness towards the Jew, the everlasting citizen who has earned immunity even when forced by his necessities to live among festering filth. Every lecture-room poured learning into you and over you; every corridor tricked you into pupillage. Knowledge was there, anyone could pluck it without fear of hierarchical damnation. Every university in England seemed to have sent specimens illustrating the disease, its cause and ravages; even demonstrators had come with their specimens.

Germany had a special court, so had France, so had Sweden; every nation was represented officially. We discussed the increase in Ireland, the decrease in England, the almost stationary condition in France. A Secretary of State expressed the significance of all these doings, when, addressing the foreign delegates, he pictured himself as contemplating the desolation ever present in every nation and only to be prevented by the Congresses, "such as this," and by the slow, steady, ceaseless work for mankind which such a congress represented.

Now, London is also interested in tuberculosis. This must be so, for out of every ten coffins made for its citizens one is destined for a consumptive. London has had its exhibition and conference on tuberculosis. An explanatory publication was issued by a Committee of Management and the names of a Consultative Committee took up the whole of one page, and names of men and women of eminence in medicine and of importance in social life were in the list. Naturally, anyone interested deeply in the great subject felt it impossible to stay away from a conference of such apparent importance, for the advertising was well done. It was important to know the medical world had progressed in its attack on tuberculosis since the meeting at Washington. Urbane representatives of publishing firms and of other firms were everywhere. Pamphlets containing empirical formulæ of the usual kind were distributed. Samples of drugs obsolete ten years ago were pressed on you. There were stalls for excellent instruments, excellent and most nutritious food, and there was absolutely nothing new or old of any special interest to men specially interested in the nature or treatment of tuberculosis. The exhibition as far as tuberculosis was concerned was almost non-existent. Such a conference and exhibition might have done so much good. Everyone is interested in the poor wretch who is struck down because his physique is poor and his surroundings full of infection. Hundreds and thousands of people came into the Washington corridors to view the house of the workman as a breeding place for consumptives and the house, the same house, altered at a ridiculously small cost until it was as safe as the average Englishman's home; models of slum houses with ready-made arrangements for ventilation, rough verandahs for sleeping out in back yards; photographs alone, a large array of them would have been useful, photographs showing vividly the dangers lurking in workshops. An Apostles' Creed of Hygiene might have been exposed with kindergarten attractiveness, statistics of disease put as the magazines can put them—all kind of dodges to make the British people understand the danger.

I do not wish for a moment to decry a conference or that kind of thing because it is a small affair. The more the better, even if they are all called "national" and are stated to be exhibitions and are held in the centre of the Empire. The work to be done will tax all the powers of England, both official and voluntary. Every medical officer of health and every medical practitioner will be needed in this war against a preventable disease. There is in such a campaign room for all sorts of volunteers; earnestness without knowledge is apotential power, but it must be guided by knowledge with earnestness. Let there be business-like methods in marshalling all such forces, let the management be capable of management, let the nation be taught by the best teachers, by those who not only have the gift of eloquence, but the more important possession of knowledge, the full knowledge of the subject they are called upon to expound.

One point more. I find no notice of this London Conference and Exhibition in either the Lancet or the British Medical Journal, nor do I hear of any attempt to publish the papers given in the lecture-room.

SHALL AND WILL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I beg to submit, for the favour of your criticism, two additional points connected with shall and will.

A long time ago, I had a discussion with a Master of Arts of one of the British Universities on Shall I go? and Will I go? My opinion was that Will I go? was always incorrect, and could be addressed only to a quack, to a man who would try to pass himself off as a diviner; in fact, that the question could be used only to mystify a mystifier; because this expression meant in French: "Est-ce que vous croyez que je veux aller?" a question which would be considered absurd or impertinent if used, in common parlance, to a French "interlocuteur."

The English scholar asked: "Do you mean that I should be wrong if I were to say, 'Will I go?' Of course I will?" My answer was: "To my mind you would. If I were you, I should prefer this: 'You ask me if I will go. Of course I will.'" (Vous me demandez si je veux aller, évidemment que je le veux.) "But what is your authority for that?" inquired my interlocutor. "Bain," I replied. "But Bain is a poor authority upon a question of this nature," retorted the English scholar; and he continued, "Allow me to tell you that your French is also a very unsafe guide under the circumstances." I was struck dumb, having no other arguments to offer.

Many years have elapsed since we had this discussion, and the more I think it over the more I feel disposed—with due deference to Galileo—to apply to my doubt in the matter the spirit of the words of that English poet who said—in speaking of the derision with which the great astronomer was treated, when he "proclaimed that the world, in a regular orbit, was ceaselessly whirled"—"It moves, for all that."

The second point is the difference between "shall you?" and "will you?"

An English clergyman, to whom I generally applied for philological advice, criticised me once, because I stated that I preferred "shall you?" to "will you?" in translating the following sentence:—"Quand aurez-vous onze ans?" (When shall you be eleven?). By putting this question, I added, "I expect the boy or the girl to answer: 'I shall be eleven at such and such a date,' and not, 'I will be eleven,' which would not be English." This gentleman's opinion was that I should be more correct if I used "will you?" The following are the additional explanations which I gave him, but which, unfortunately, did not convince him. According to Mason's grammar, when you expect the answer to be "I shall," you say "Shall you?" When you expect it to be "I will," you say "Will you?" If, for instance, I were to translate into English this question: "Quand commencerez-vous le grec?" I would say, "When shall you begin Greek?" if I spoke to a schoolboy, and "When will you make your pupils begin Greek?" if I addressed myself to a headmaster; in the event of the latter's school being a private institution, where the headmaster could act as he pleased, the difference being that the schoolboy has no power to act as he likes in his school, whilst the headmaster of a private school has that power, and can, therefore, exercise his own will, at any time, and when he chooses to do so.

I now beg to submit to you my French interpretation of the two forms under consideration:—

"When shall you begin Greek?"

Quand commencerez-vous le grec? c'est-à-dire, quand vous ferez-vous commencer le grec? quand serez-vous obligé de commencer le grec?

"When will you make your pupils begin Greek?"

Quand ferez-vous commencer le grec à vos élèves? C'est-à-dire, quand serez-vous disposé à faire commencer, quand voudrez-vous faire commencer, le grec à vos élèves?

A FRENCH LINGUIST.

A SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL IN SOUTHWARK CATHEDRAL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—A recumbent figure of the poet Shakespeare in alabaster with Tudor Gothic canopy and screen is to be erected in a recess in the south aisle of the above cathedral, where it will form a pendant to the beautiful tomb of Gower opposite. Shakespeare was a parishioner of St. Saviour's for many years, at a time when regular attendance at church was absolutely compulsory, and Southwark Cathedral, as St. Saviour's is now called, is the one building remaining in London with which he was intimately connected. The total cost will be about £650, and the Chapter would be glad to raise this comparatively small sum before the Commemoration Service is held on April the 23rd next.

Those who are proud to think that the greatest name in literature belongs to a compatriot, but who doubt whether a theatre is the best memorial, may be glad of this opportunity of repaying their indebtedness. Cheques made payable to The Shakespeare (Southwark) Memorial, and crossed London and Westminster Bank, should be addressed to Canon Thompson, or to me, and sent to the Cathedral, London Bridge, S.E.

Yours faithfully,

RALPH LEFTWICH

THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

By HOPE PROTHEROE, Author of "One Man's Sin."

An up-to-date novel, in style and method of subject treatment, and a decided advance on "ONE MAN'S SIN." Those who, as a result of reading that book, expect only pathos from this author, will, in "THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE," be agreeably disappointed. A rough diamond and a rose would be strange mates indeed; yet no whit more so than the couple of human beings whose story is here presented. How a man may struggle in vain against a force stronger than himself, and a woman become a daily terror to the man who loves her, are graphically portrayed. The sympathy of most will be extended to the man, who, in the depth of his own despair, takes the blame of his wife's action upon himself, and deals forcibly, yet withal in gentlemanly fashion, with his worse than—interfering mother-in-law. The last chapter leaves the reader, with a distinct note of hopefulness and the prospect of the hero's final reclamation, and that at the hands of a woman who has, herself, a "conscientious scruple" that will inevitably affect her future life. It is a book that everyone should read and recommend. It is at times comic, dramatic and sensational, and the interest it inspires is fully sustained to the end.

A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.

A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story offers the kind of fare which will appeal to most readers of fiction. Miss Effie Chamberlayne, the author of "A SHOOTING STAR," comes from a political family; but in addition to her knowledge of affairs, she shows that she possesses, in an uncommon degree, the quination and humour that go to make up the successful novelist. The story itself, which is laid mainly in England, is concerned with the possession of some politically "compromising documents"; and the mystery surrounding both the recovery of the papers, and the personality of the Agent attempting the task, is manipulated with a dexterity and a resource not often to be met with in a first effort. "A SHOOTING STAR" leads up by stages to an exciting and dramatic climax, in which, however, the probabilities are kept well within bounds. Miss Effie Chamberlayne has written a story in which there is a due admixture of light and shade, of grave and gay; and the ranks of wholesome, natural, and straightforward fiction have received a recruit whose work should be heartily welcomed.

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
sgd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

It has taken years for the majority of the leading magazines to reach anywhere near where Nash's Magazine begins. Nash's Magazine is a gigantic undertaking: the paper used for No. 1 would, if unrolled, stretch from London to Edinburgh—a distance of over 400 miles. Its policy will be to give to the public each month a magazine containing stories by the world's most famous novelists.

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations, 7/6 net.

This is the first book which has been published on the bloodless but far-reaching Revolution in Turkey, an event worthy of a place beside the great liberating movements of Greece and Italy, and destined to change profoundly the issues of the Near Eastern question. It contains information which can only be learnt from the lips of the actual authors of the movement. These Mr. Buxton has had a unique opportunity of knowing personally, having accompanied his brother, Mr. Noel Buxton, the chairman of the Balkan Committee, in the recent deputation to Constantinople. He describes the leading Young Turks, the Sultan, the Grand Vizier, the Sheikh-ul-Islam, and the growth, success, prospects and dangers of the new movement.

ARMY REFORM, and other Addresses

By the Rt. Hon. R. B. HALDANE, M.P. Cheap Edition. Cloth, 2/6 net.

The Daily News says:—"Each of these speeches is a masterpiece of exposition, wherein an intricate mass of facts is unfolded with exquisite skill and clearness. The broad facts are stated; one example in detail is cited; the broad principle is enunciated, and rings out as an inevitable logical conclusion."

IN MY LADY'S GARDEN

By Mrs. RICHMOND (late Garden Editor of "The Queen"). With 2 Coloured Illustrations and 48 other Plates. 12/6 net.

This book is divided into chapters for each week in the year, in which clear practical advice is given on the care of the garden, the laying out of the grounds, the lawn, the conservatory, the wild garden and the water garden; the cultivation of the new hardy waterlilies in many rich tints being thus brought within the reach of all. Nature Notes on the birds of the garden, their uses, wants, and ways, are added, with many interesting notes on matters connected with the garden.

THAT ROCK GARDEN OF OURS

By Professor F. E. HULME, F.L.S., F.S.A. With 8 Coloured Plates and 42 other Illustrations. 10/6 net.

Professor Hulme is a genial "guide, philosopher and friend," and the reader wanders with him amongst the plants, picking an anemone here, a ragged robin there, in delightful enjoyment. The book is full of charm in its chatty and reminiscent style, and the large number of illustrations with which it is embellished increase its usefulness and add very considerably to its interest and value.

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"... He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible hitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chalonér believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chalonér goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horse-shoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

A fecund sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Colocunda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly bags and matrons fair!
His votarees doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chalonér steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spang'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Croons whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Okeads—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvuses of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chalonér to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

LIFE AND LETTERS

It seems that the fashionable thing to say about FitzGerald is that "he taught us how to live." The Daily Mail has said it, and with the help of a Mr. Edward Thomas, the Saturday Review has managed to say it; so that "poor old Fitz" has achieved true fame at last. For clearly to have taught the Daily Mail and the Saturday Review how to live is a feat of no particularly mean order. Of course, the facts with regard to FitzGerald the man are dead against any supposition that he was acquainted with the art of life. To all intents he made a mess of the whole business, as poets will; and if he had been "dependent upon his own exertions for a living" heaven alone knows where he would have ended. And apart from practical questions of livelihood, FitzGerald displayed qualities, which, though they may be imitated by the Daily Mail and the Saturday Review, are not commonly considered admirable. We suppose that at the time of a man's centenary nothing but good should be remembered about him. On the other hand, we have it on the authority of Shakespeare (who knew nothing about centenarians or the delightful opportunities they offer to the advertising mediocrity) that men's evil deeds live after them. There was an indiscretion of FitzGerald's which we think removes him very far from the possibility of consideration as a model practitioner in the business of life. We refer to the pious ejaculation which he uttered when he was informed of the death of Mrs. Browning. As a contribution to the centenary proceedings a correspondent sends us the following lines:—

EDWARD FITZGERALD.

One who emblazoning a dead man's name,
Cut his own niche of everlasting fame,
On a dead woman used his new-found skill,
Soiled it, with infamy adhering still.
How judge this Janus-head? His sin? His power?
God holds the balance, and we wait His hour.

Which shows that there are people in the world who do not forget. However, from the point of view of reason and common sense, it is obvious that FitzGerald's importance to us lies in the fact that he wrote a poem. And it is obvious also that the man who attempted to conduct his life either in the same way that FitzGerald conducted his life, or in the beautiful manner suggested by FitzGerald's poem would be a good deal of a fool. Even Mr. Shorter could not do it and show a profit.

From the Englishwoman for April we take the following glad tidings:

Our friends have helped us generously. Some assist by selling the Englishwoman at public meetings, others by enlisting subscribers. The sale shows signs of increasing—but it can only increase satisfactorily if the efforts of those whom we have pleased and who care to assist us are continued. We may be pardoned if we repeat that we are anxious to send as many prospectuses as may be desired to any address.

There is writing for you! It sounds like a passage from a parish magazine, and one expects to be told that "the blanket fund is making favourable progress" and that, "thanks to the energy and generosity of Mrs. Brown and the Misses Smith, our grand annual jumble sale proved an immense success—the sum of fourteen and sixpence being realised in hard cash, which sum has been placed to the credit of the pea-soup fund." Suffragitis is coming to something, even for Suffragitis. But the Englishwoman is not an organ of the charities. On the contrary, it is a political organ and a literary organ. Its politics are very serious. We are informed, for example, that "last month the Report of the Truck Committee was considered with a view of explaining one of the social and industrial subjects that were ready for legislation. This month the Committee on Home Work is taken up with a similar object." Obviously, nothing could be more entertaining, particularly as no mention is made of Mrs. Pankhurst. And as for the literature:

The Poet was sitting in his garden at the close of a warm autumn day; the sun's last rays gilded the chapel spire hard by. He had been reading a little gaily-decorated volume, vellum-bound and silver-clasped; but it now lay beside him upon a stone sundial, and he was gazing at the wonderful sunset beyond the dark towers and gables of the city. The river to his left shone like the burnished gold that blazoned his book, and birds were singing amidst the mellow russet leafage of the trees.

We have heard of persons who possess castles in Spain; but "a garden at the close of day" rather takes the breath, even when a poet is concerned. Besides which, what was the Englishwoman's poet (he happens to be Chaucer) doing with a "river to his left"? What was Chaucer's "left" anyway? And does the Englishwoman wish to suggest to us that the Morning Star of Song was a member of the Territorials? Besides which, why, when "a little gaily-decorated volume, vellum-bound and silver-clasped," is mentioned—why, we ask, is the usual formula "(Grant Richards)" carefully omitted? However, we must not interrogate the Englishwoman too closely, particularly as a shining contribution called "A Glimpse of Turkish Women" begins:

My knowledge of Turkish women is small.

We note with some alarm that Messrs. Odhams have once more taken to apologising. This time they "desire to tender their apology to the public and the trade on account of the physical impossibility to keep pace with the demand" for "Bottomley's Book," the which extraordinary production they proceed to describe as "an ideal volume for the Easter Holidays"! From a page of Press opinions as to this book, we gather that it is "a remarkable book" and that "everybody will read it"; the Pall Mall Gazette calls it "entertaining," and the Sporting Life says that it "thrills and fascinates"; while Mr. Bottomley's friend and late contributor, Frank Harris, remarks "As an instance of sheer power of work this book stands almost alone." We like the judicious "almost," and we observe that the opinion of Messrs. Odhams's paper, the Guardian, is not quoted.

Meanwhile it is to be remarked that "Bottomley's Book" contains certain statements and suggestions with respect to the "secret history" of Bottomley's recent prosecution at the Guildhall. Bottomley asserts roundly that this prosecution was set afoot because the Government desired to "silence" the great Horatio, who, it seems, had been "exposing" the Government's broken pledges in Parliament. And right opposite the reprint of these charges Mr. Bottomley reproduces the cartoon which was held to amount to a contempt of court during the time of his trial and which represents the figure of Justice bespattered with mud and carrying mud in her scales. In view of what has happened, the reiteration of the aforesaid statements and suggestions and the reprinting of the aforesaid cartoon make it clear that Mr. Bottomley wishes the people of England to understand that English justice is an affair of politics, and that his acquittal by an Alderman at the Guildhall proves this. We say that it proves nothing of the kind. We say, further, that Mr. Bottomley's own actions since the trial leave the authorities no alternative but to take steps to have the whole matter thrashed out. We shall give our reasons at length next week.

It seems that we are to have a new religion, the high priests of which will be the impious Mr. Aleister Crowley and the anarchistic Mr. Frank Harris. Mr. Crowley appears to be the founder of the movement. But, no doubt out of compliment to Mr. Harris, Mr. Crowley has called the concern "The A. A.," which is understood to mean the 'Appy 'Arrises. And the 'Appy 'Arrises—we trust that our surmise as to the meaning of the A. A. is the correct one—have just published the first number of a new magazine called The Equinox, which is devoted to an explanation of the 'Appy 'Arrises' religious tenets. So far as we can gather, the religion of Messrs. Crowley and Harris is a most curious affair. The neophyte is invited to hop round on one leg and breathe through one nostril for an hour at a stretch, and apparently this has to be done in a state of nudity. Playing-cards also figure in Mr. Crowley's ritual. In the current issue of Mr. Frank Harris's Vanity Fair we are assured that The Equinox contains some "excellent mystical poetry" by Mr. Crowley, together with a capital short story (by Mr. Frank Harris) which "is alone worth the five shillings asked for the volume." Clearly, the other new religion-mongers must look to their laurels.

The "black-out" article published in the March number of the English Review has served to create a considerable pothor, thus fulfilling the high hopes of its author and of the editor of the English Review. We understand that the Spectator was so moved at the sight of this article that it proceeded straightway to fill in one of Mr. Belloc's blanks by a species of indirect innuendo. Mr. Belloc, of course, fell into shrieks of rage and called the Spectator "liar," and "summoned" the Spectator to print his noisy disclaimer. And to put matters straight and keep the ball of advertisement merrily rolling the English Review, through its solicitors, made a further statement in the Spectator of last week. Mr. Belloc is really in no position to shout. Before the Spectator said a word on the subject we offered to print in these columns any true statements which the editor of the English Review had caused to be blacked out of Mr. Belloc's article. Mr. Belloc professes that he is most anxious to have his article printed without the suppression of names, and the editor of the English Review protests that he suppressed names only out of fear of the legal consequences. Our offer to oblige Mr. Belloc and to relieve the editor of the English Review of his fearful and wonderful risks would, one imagines, have been welcomed by an author and an editor who are not looking for advertisement, but are solicitous only for the public interest. Yet neither Mr. Belloc nor Mr. Hueffer has the pluck to bring on his true statements. In these circumstances, we are justified in assuming that Mr. Belloc's article is more or less of a fancy article, and that if it contained names when it was submitted to the editor of the English Review Mr. Belloc had associated with those names charges which he is not in a position to substantiate and which have consequently had to be dropped because, as a matter of fact, they are not the truth, but libels. The solicitors of the English Review commit themselves to the extraordinary statement that "the law of libel, while satisfactory in its working as regards private persons, makes it difficult and dangerous to refer in the Press to the public shortcomings of public men," which, of course, is the direct opposite of the facts. It has never been in the slightest degree dangerous for the Press to refer to the public shortcomings of public men, and, for that matter, it has never been in the slightest degree dangerous for the Press to refer to the public shortcomings of private men. To take an instance in point, we will suppose that quite lately some leader-writer or other has said of Mr. Asquith that his conduct in the matter of failing to supply Dreadnoughts proves him to be a traitor to his country. Here, obviously, your leader-writer travels right out of the region of fair comment, and it would be open to Mr. Asquith to take an action for libel. Mr. Asquith would take no such action, for the very simple reason that he is a public man and that the very severest, most truculent, most unfair and most malicious criticism of his public actions would not be considered libel of a sufficiently serious nature to justify an award of more than nominal damages. If the late Mr. Gladstone or the present Mr. Balfour or Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd George had instituted proceedings for libel on every occasion upon which they had been technically libelled their lives would have been one continual course of litigation and farthing damage getting. And as regards the private action of public men, if any man knows that Mr. Asquith or Mr. Lloyd George or Mr. Winston Churchill or Mr. John Burns has at any time accepted bribes or other nefarious consideration as an inducement to perform such and such a public act he need never be afraid of saying so in print and in the largest possible type. Mr. Belloc ought to know this as well as we know it, and so did Mr. Hueffer.

The truth is not libel, and sometimes even the falsehood is not libel. The only real libel and the only dangerous libel is the malicious falsehood. Mr. Lloyd George has recently taken damages from a newspaper for libel. The common impression appears to be that Mr. Lloyd George obtained those damages because he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that, consequently, it is dangerous to libel a Cabinet Minister. In point of fact, Mr. Lloyd George got his damages because he swore that the libel was untrue, and because the other side admitted that it was untrue, and that, consequently, it ought never to have been printed. The law would have worked out in precisely the same way for any private person possessed of an English domicile. Of course, a Chancellor of the Exchequer, because of his position, might secure heavier damages than the private citizen. On the other hand, we are acquainted with private citizens who, if they were to be libelled in the manner in which Mr. Lloyd George was libelled, would get a good deal heavier damages. Clearly, a Chancellor of the Exchequer can afford to let you down fairly gently over such matters.

Mr. Hueffer's mistake is either a wilful mistake indulged for the sake of effect; or it is the mistake of ignorance. Both himself and his lawyers may take it from us that nothing in the world is safer than to refer in the Press to the "public shortcomings of public men." The public shortcomings of public men are really the daily bread of half the newspapers in the Kingdom. Whether it be in the Times or the Skibbereen Eagle your public man's public shortcomings are always fair and safe game, and the laws of libel and the judicial interpretation of the laws of libel are not likely to be revolutionised for the mere sake of providing the editor of the English Review with an opportunity of whining over his helpless position. Our offer to Messrs. Belloc and Hueffer still remains open. We will fill up their blanks for them in these columns, provided they will give us the names and the proofs. And if they have no proofs, and particularly if they have no names, let them, in the interests of common decency, cease from girding at the terrible hardships imposed on them by the law of libel.

From the Rev. Father Tabb we have received the appended verse:

JOAN OF ARC, 1431-1909.
Where once above the fagots leaped a flame
To blast thy world-renown,
Another kindles blazing thy name
Upon a martyr's crown.

Admirers of Father Tabb's poetry will learn with regret that he is now almost entirely blind and is compelled, as he puts it, to write by faith instead of by sight.

Mr. Shorter evidently regrets his recent talk about "pricking the bubble of Palgrave's 'Golden Treasury,'" though he does not appear to have grace enough to say so in terms. Mr. Shorter's way of crying "peccavi" is singular. For weeks he keeps his mouth tight shut. Then all of a sudden you find him indulging in a pæan about "the Macmillans" and their "excellent" "Golden Treasury" Series. And this at the top of his far-famed "Literary Letter" in the Sphere. The amende honorable is thus accorded to Messrs. Macmillan. And, so far as Poetry is concerned, Mr. Shorter would excuse himself for his impudent remark by explaining, rather feebly and tearfully, that when he proposed to "prick the bubble of Palgrave's 'Golden Treasury,'" he did not propose to prick the bubble of Palgrave's "Golden Treasury," but to prick the complacency of "the people who read Palgrave's 'Golden Treasury.'" Clearly, therefore, Mr. Shorter is either capable, on occasion, of writing what he does not mean or he is capable of being fairly tricky on his feet when you bring him to book. And, by way of revenge on THE ACADEMY for pointing out his gross literary lapse, he calls upon the editor of a paper which is not even remotely involved in the argument to publish a cartoon of the Editor of THE ACADEMY "surrounded by solicitors." Mr. Shorter imagines that hereby he is most cutting, and that at length he has got in a rapier-thrust worthy even of his friend, Mr. W. L. Courtney. Poor, dear Clement—what a little fire-eater it is! Let it tell us something about the sonnet in the next column.

THE POET

They gave him scorn and hate and the fierce rod
Of bitter words, they strangled him with lies,
But from his lips there came no meaner cries
Than these that were the very songs of God.
They made his years a Hell-scorch'd period,
And he but smiled and cast his conquering eyes
Along the level lawns of Paradise
Where late the luminous feet of angels trod.

There the ripe fruits are stars upon the trees,
And in the air that is like yellow wine
Ever the birds of rapture soar and sing
Their silver songs in magical sweet keys,
And round about him in a golden line
The shining seraphim stand wing to wing.

OUR SWEET CONTEMPORARIES

It is a stock saying among lawyers that the fear of publicity prevents many prosecutions; in other words, that persons who have been unjustly or improperly treated refrain from availing themselves of the protection of the law because they shrink from the publicity of the courts. Up to a point, this is no doubt true. A woman snatches your watch in Leicester Square at any time after sundown. You require a certain courage to prosecute. There are a thousand considerations to be weighed, and, on the whole, knowing what you do know of "publicity," your courage fails you. Why should this be? Honest publicity hurts no honest person, and, of course, this is exactly where the rub comes in. For in the present condition of journalism a fair, square and honest publicity appears to be entirely unknown. At the present moment the enlightened newspaper Press of this country are counting out their hapence after making what they consider to be an entirely beautiful scoop out of the name of the Editor of this paper. The Daily Mail must have made a fortune over the affair; and so must that high and impartial organ, the Pall Mall Gazette. And the others have followed suit with a fidelity which does credit to their imitative faculties. Meanwhile, and generally and in the public interest we shall take leave to look a little closely into the report or "story" with which the united newspaper Press of this country backed up its sensational contents' bills. At Bow Street, on Tuesday afternoon last, a turf commission agent, trading in the name of Charles Read, and possessing offices in the Haymarket, was charged with committing an assault upon Lord Alfred Douglas, and was ordered by the magistrate to find a surety in £20 for his good behaviour for six months, or, in default, to undergo a month's imprisonment. The circumstances, as explained on oath in the court, were that Charles Read owed Lord Alfred Douglas £110, which he had failed to pay, though three "settling days" had passed since the money became due; that he had called upon Lord Alfred Douglas at the office of this paper and done his best to pay what was due in blows instead of in money. The prisoner's "defence," which was delivered from the dock, and not from the witness-box, and, consequently, not on oath, was that Lord Alfred had kept him waiting for a sum of £25, and that he had been slung down and thrown all over THE ACADEMY offices. It was explained, however, that the £25 had been paid before the present transaction was entered into, and that, so far from being slung down and thrown all over the office, the prisoner had merely been restrained; and this he admitted. Consequently, the magistrate made the order to which we have referred. These are the facts. Here is what purports to be a report of the proceedings:

FIGHT IN AN OFFICE.

A turf accountant named Charles Read, of the Haymarket, was accused at Bow Street yesterday of assaulting Lord Alfred Bruce Douglas, a son of the eighth Marquis of Queensberry and editor of the ACADEMY, and was ordered to find a surety in £20 for his good behaviour.

Lord Alfred Douglas said Read owed him £110 in connection with bets, and he sent his solicitor to see him about the matter.

"Read came to my office in Lincoln's Inn and was admitted to my room," he stated. "He immediately threw off his coat and hat and struck at me. One of the clerks came in and helped me to restrain him until a policeman arrived."

"He owed me £25 for six months," Read retorted. "I sent the account for thirteen weeks to White's Club, where he always went for his cheque when he won. When he lost he never went there for the closing account."

This "report" is culled from the Daily Express, one of the newspapers owned, or partly owned, by Mr. Cyril Arthur Pearson. Is it a fair and reasonable report? To begin with the title, was there a fight in THE ACADEMY office? Read himself admitted that nobody struck him. Mr. Read is a small and protuberant little man. Nobody would think of hitting him. He came to THE ACADEMY office in a condition bordering on hysteria, and he kicked and scratched and flung himself about like a naughty schoolboy. If fighting had been indicated, there was an eleven-stone publishing clerk about, who happens to be a member of the Naval Reserve, and there was a sixteen-stone assistant editor who could easily have made up in zeal for what he may lack in skill. There was also the Editor himself, who is a head taller than Mr. Read, and in no way short of either wind or reach. So that when Mr. C. Arthur Pearson's hapenny organ says "Fight in an office" it is obviously talking through its hat. As to the report itself, there is no harm whatever in being a son of the eighth Marquess of Queensberry; but the fact was not mentioned at Bow Street. Secondly, Mr. Pearson's organ carefully omits to mention that Read was to undergo a month's imprisonment if he failed to find his surety. And, thirdly, the absolute fairness and impartiality of Mr. C. Arthur Pearson's organ is indicated by the final paragraph of this so-called report, wherein Read is made to say that Lord Alfred Douglas owed him £25 for six months, and the readers of Mr. Pearson's organ are left to assume that the money had not been paid; and that, consequently, it is still owing, and that, therefore, Read had some show of reason for withholding the £110 which he still owes to Lord Alfred Douglas. The Daily Express is not singular in its gross misrepresentation of the position. The Daily Mirror, which is owned, or partly owned, by a recent recruit to the peerage, who, consequently, should have known better, is equally careful to suppress the facts which do not please him. And the Daily Mail, owned, or partly owned, in the same quarter, goes out of its way to report ex-parte statements which Read, in his rage, appears to have shrieked out in the corridor of the court, and not in the court itself at all. While the Star, that well-known advocate of justice for the masses, reports the whole proceedings under the title of "An Editor's Bet," instead of under the perfectly just and proper title of "A Bookmaker's Pangs at Parting." We believe that Mr. Parkes, who edits the Star, is an authority on horses, having once owned a mare who died in a field—she was an agricultural mare and not an immoral, spotted racehorse—and it is, therefore, that we are astonished at his wonderful confusion of ideas.

We now come to what is, perhaps, an even graver question. Where did our inspired and beautiful contemporaries obtain their "reports"? At the moment when the naughty Mr. Read found himself in the dock at Bow Street the magistrate was on the point of rising and the reporters had left the court. There was not a soul about the place except the magistrate and the magistrate's clerk, Lord Alfred Douglas and his witnesses, the prisoner and the police. It is obvious that Mr. Marsham, the magistrate, did not "report" the case, otherwise it would not have been unfairly reported; it is obvious that the prisoner did not report the case, otherwise it would not have been reported; and it is obvious that the prosecutor did not report the case, because, when all is said, the editor of a threepenny journal could scarcely stoop to the supply of news from the police courts to the editors of haporths, however brilliantly owned. And as for the police, it is certain that they did not report the case, because they do not possess the necessary literary endowments and graces, let alone that rolling eye for the sensational which is so requisite in the police court reporter. The magistrate's clerk is the only person left. He, of course, is precluded by his office from supplying information to the papers. So that right in our midst, and when we were not expecting it, a miracle has happened. How do these things get into the papers? It is the miracle! On the other hand, there is nothing miraculous in the suppressio veri and suggestio falsi of our dulcet, honey-tongued, timbrel-throated and sore-backed contemporaries. Their conduct has been merely, clearly, patiently, obviously and unmistakably human. The blue-faced ape of Horus sits and gibbers at the stick which has been laid about his unholy sides. Mr. Read, of the Haymarket, who in the main is a genial chap, but whose angry passions get the better of him the moment that he finds himself compelled to write a cheque, has given the blue-faced ape his chance, and the blue-faced ape has taken it. He is welcome, and we, who are not the editor of THE ACADEMY, wish him joy of himself. And we shall note, we hope, by way of conclusion, that the sporting papers almost to a sporting paper have neglected to report the proceedings. We construe this abstention as an indication either of a love of fair play or a keen affection for the advertisements of Mr. Charles Read. As for Mr. Read himself, we would remind him, in the words of a famous author whose name he would appear to have appropriated, that, come what may in the way of bindings over to keep the peace, "it's never too late to mend." And on the general question of "reports" we think that in the circumstances it is the duty of some responsible journal to justify itself by acquainting the polite world with the nature of its sources of information, and the reasons which have induced it to garble its notice of this affair. We do not deny the interest which attaches to it, but we utterly deny the right of any newspaper to misrepresent what takes place in any of the King's courts, no matter if it be only Bow Street, for the mere purpose of making sales, or for the still less creditable purpose of getting back "a little bit of its own."

THE SOCIALIST IN OXFORD

THE Report of the Select Committee, issued late last Autumn, under the title "Oxford and Working Class Education," has, perhaps, scarcely met with the attention it deserves. Of its intrinsic merits and demerits, of the effect which its adoption would necessarily have upon University life, sufficient was said at the time. The January Blackwood contained an admirable summary and a no less wholesome criticism of the Report; and, on the whole, the newspapers dealt with the subject in a manner as detailed as could reasonably be expected. Of the scheme embodied in the Report, the last word, one would fancy, is contained in an article in the current Oxford and Cambridge Review, an article obviously written from the standpoint of the intelligent undergraduate. Briefly summarised, as everyone knows, the Report held that the advantages of an Oxford training should not be confined to the "upper" and "middle" classes: that it was essential for the wellbeing of the State that artisans should be enabled to share in the privileges, social as well as intellectual, of Oxford life; and that in practice no such difficulties would be raised as to put the scheme out of the range of possibility. As has been suggested, the scheme in itself has met with some very trenchant criticism. On this head no more could be desired. But, unfortunately, the full significance of the Report has not been realised, because all writers have treated it as an isolated piece of wrong-headed sentiment. As a matter of fact, such a view is quite untenable. Those who watch the life of Oxford are beginning to realise that the efforts of such men as Canon Barnett and Mr. W. Temple form only one side of a conspiracy which is actually, if not nominally, Socialistic. The growing activity of the Socialist party in Oxford goes along two lines; there is, on the one hand, this very open attempt to upset all the traditions of the place, and on the other a much more dangerous, because much more subtle, effort to capture Oxford from within. Of the open enemies perhaps enough has been said. They are, for the most part, amiable Dons, whose hearts are, possibly, stronger than their heads. The Report, "Oxford and Working Class Education," shows so remarkable an absence of any understanding of a sympathy with Oxford's aims that it may almost be said to have defeated itself.

The other movement, however, is of infinitely greater importance, and is still going on unchecked. There is, as every Oxford man knows, a certain body of opinion, comparatively small, yet not without influence, which is definitely Socialistic in tendency. Most undergraduates come up—most thinking undergraduates, at any rate—with a hazy conviction that all is not for the best in this best of all possible worlds. They are just beginning to notice some of the evils which seem inseparable from any industrial system and to feel a Quixotic desire to find some remedy. That such men fall under the influence of the Fabian Society is scarcely to be wondered at. Satan as an angel of light might well deceive the very elect. And no one grudges the Fabian Society such converts. One regrets the waste of good intentions, but no more. Still, it is a fact worthy of consideration that the majority of Oxford "Fabians" have joined the Society during their first term. The result, however, is to produce a fairly strong body of Fabians. But what must be remembered is that in comparison with the numbers of the University—in comparison, even, with the numbers of serious undergraduates—they are few. Unfortunately, they possess a certain proportion of fairly well-known men, and during the last year they have been gradually arrogating to themselves the right to speak for the whole University.

As recently as last term the "Union Society" passed a motion in favour of the introduction of working men into Oxford. The result was exactly what was to be expected. Radical and Labour papers and politicians declared loudly (and with a certain show of reason) that the "great heart of Oxford" was for Social Reform. Now, any Oxford man knows that, whatever was the case in the past, the "Union Society" does not represent undergraduate opinion. It is ruled by a clique and it is supported by the "mildly intellectual" type of man, whose intentions are as good as his intelligence is bad. A man who maintains that the "Union" Vote of last term was a proof of Oxford's readiness for this particular type of reform is either grossly out of touch with Oxford or else absolutely unscrupulous.

The close of term, however, saw a further venture in the same direction. Mr. Kier Hardie was brought down to Oxford. His reception was, to say the least, not a cordial one, and the result was the usual outcry of "undergraduate manners," "childish intolerance"—in fact, all the ordinary cant reflections were made. Now, the responsibility for any outbreak—and a serious disturbance was only narrowly averted—rests entirely with the officials of the Fabian Society. That they knew there would be trouble was proved by their elaborate precautions in the matter of stewards, and by their ingenious policy of seating ladies on the platform at the meeting. As a matter of fact, some form of disorder was the only method left the undergraduate of expressing his views. Had Mr. Kier Hardie been received quietly, every Radical paper would have shouted the triumph of Socialism: "Oxford, the champion of Conservatism, had received a violent Socialist with enthusiasm." A very striking confirmation of this view is afforded by Mr. Kier Hardie's disingenuous attempt to minimise the disturbance in his account of the meeting. Nobody who was present could have read without intense amazement his statement that he had enjoyed a "most successful meeting." And one must repeat, quite deliberately, that the whole affair, in so far as it was not pure bravado, was a calculated attempt to convince the world that Oxford is at heart Socialist.

The danger is, to-day, a very real one. On the one hand you have the weak-headed sentimentalist seeking to "reform" Oxford in a hopelessly impossible way; on the other you find the Fabian deliberately misrepresenting the views of the undergraduate. Once convince the "man in the street," or, for that matter, the man in the study, that the undergraduate is ready and willing to receive the working man as a brother, and half the case against the Reform Scheme falls to the ground. And so one must repeat emphatically what every Oxford man—and the Fabian not least—already knows: that Oxford has never been more Conservative than to-day, nor more opposed to violent changes. The influence of the Socialist clique cannot be lasting, depending as it does on the influence of a single school and perhaps two colleges; but it may, during a very brief period, do incalculable harm. It behoves all Oxford men to use every means of checking this misrepresentation of their views. For the rest, one must ask those outside to make very certain of their facts ere they move. The Quixotism which is only an amiable weakness in a freshman becomes a positive vice in a man of responsibility. Men like Canon Barnett and Mr. W. Temple cannot help knowing that their schemes—whatever their intrinsic merits—are wholly unacceptable in Oxford: they come from outside and not inside the University. And it is scarcely too much to say that their arguments, their endeavours to spread abroad a belief that Oxford will receive the "Working-man Scholars" gladly are proof either of incredible blindness or of wilful dishonesty.

THE ARDLAMONT MYSTERY SOLVED

IN the "Notable Scottish Trials" Series, published by Messrs. William Hodge and Company, of Edinburgh, there recently appeared the full report of the trial in December, 1893, of Alfred John Monson for the attempted murder of Cecil Hambrough on the 9th of August of that year, and the murder of the same young man on the following day. The attempted murder was alleged to have taken place on the night of the 9th of August, when Alfred Monson, according to the theory of the prosecution, acting in collusion with Edward Scott, induced the boy Cecil Hambrough to go out on a sea-fishing expedition and endeavoured to drown him. On the following morning Monson, again according to the theory of the prosecution, with the knowledge and connivance of Edward Scott, shot and killed Cecil Hambrough. In short, we have our old and much-discussed case "the Ardlamont mystery." The book contains the full verbatim report of the case, the speeches for the prosecution, and the defence, and the judge's summing up, and it was pure chance that induced us the other day to pick it up and read it, and thereby for the first time to obtain any real knowledge of this extraordinary case. We sat down to read it in an impartial frame of mind—that is to say, we were not conscious of prejudice one way or the other, and while we remembered more or less vaguely the general outlines of the case from reading the reports in the newspapers at the time the trial was proceeding, we had never come to any definite and final conclusion about it. We began the book languidly, we got interested, we became absorbed, we read it breathlessly to the end: the verdict of "Not Proven." We rubbed our eyes and read it all through again carefully and judicially, and with ever-increasing amazement and horror. For there is no mystery, no ambiguity, no possible room for doubt in the mind of any man with brains and a heart; Alfred Monson was innocent of the charges brought against him, and not only was he innocent, but the case against him of the prosecution was scarcely even a superficially plausible case. We defy any honest man of ordinary intelligence to read this book through and come to any other conclusion. Mr. Comrie Thomson, who defended Monson, was able to show conclusively that so far from there being any motive which could have actuated such an appalling crime as that alleged against Monson, the death of Cecil Hambrough meant complete financial ruin to Monson, and every consideration of self-interest made it incumbent on him to keep him alive. If Cecil Hambrough had lived till he was twenty-one years old, Monson would have received a large sum of money, and if he had died at any time after he was twenty-one years old Monson would have received £20,000, the amount of his insurance policy. Yet the jury who tried the case were asked by Mr. Asher, the Solicitor-General for Scotland, to believe that Monson, a man who, according to Mr. Asher's own showing, was a clever man of the world, and versed in all the intricacies of finance, was guilty of the horrible treachery and cruelty as well as the insane idiocy of murdering Cecil Hambrough in the hope of obtaining the full amount of the insurance policy assigned to him by Cecil Hambrough, a minor, such assignment, as any man of sense must have been aware, being invalid, and not worth the paper it was written on. Quite apart from the utter absence of motive for the murder, the charge was conclusively disproved by the evidence as a whole. Such was evidently the opinion of the judge, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Sir John Macdonald, as anyone can see for himself by reading his summing-up, in which he disposes of the case for the prosecution as effectually as Mr. Comrie's eloquent speech for the defence, if less dramatically. The Lord Justice-Clerk's summing up is as plain a direction to the jury to acquit the prisoner as could possibly be made consistently with the use of judicial language. Short of telling the jury in plain English that the case for the prosecution had completely broken down, and that it was their obvious duty to bring in a verdict of acquittal, the Lord Justice-Clerk could have done no more to secure Monson's acquittal. The verdict of the jury, "Not Proven," was a cowardly and wicked verdict, given as a cowardly and wicked concession to the unfair prejudice raised against Monson in the viler section of the Press. An English jury would have unhesitatingly acquitted Monson; according to English ideas of justice, when the case against a man is not proved he is entitled to acquittal. The writer of this article is a Scotsman, and proud of it, he bears a surname which is known and honoured all over Scotland, and he says deliberately that the verdict in the Monson case was a disgrace to Scotland, a disgrace to Scottish justice and fair play, and a disgrace to humanity. And what can be said of the conduct of the Crown in the matter? Their whole case was founded on and inextricably woven up with the theory that the man Edward Scott, whose unaccountable disappearance before the trial caused so much excitement at the time, was the guilty accomplice of Monson. They used his disappearance against Monson, to his utmost prejudice, and proceeded to build up on that disappearance a hypothetical story of melodramatic villainy, which subsequent events proved to be a pure figment of the imagination. At the beginning of the case Scott's name was called, and on his failure to appear a sentence of outlawry was passed on him. The Solicitor-General worked up and completed an elaborate and gruesome picture in which the sinister figure of Edward Scott loomed largely and terribly—and then when, after the trial was over, the terrible Scott turned up and made an appearance on the music-hall stage, when he turned out to be an entirely inoffensive and rather foolish person, incapable of hurting a fly, who had run away and hidden himself in a fit of childish panic, did they make any charge against him or even appoint a commission to take his evidence? Not a bit of it; they simply rescinded the decree of outlawry which had been pronounced against him, and let the whole matter drop. The fact that if the evidence of Scott had been made public the result would have been to knock the whole bottom out of the case of the police and the prosecution, and even to make it appear supremely ridiculous, deterred them from taking any steps which might have served to vindicate the unfortunate victim who had gone out of court with his verdict of "Not Proven" to live a life of hell on earth. For to such a life was poor Alfred Monson condemned. His family behaved as families are apt to behave on this kind of occasion: a few of its members believed in his innocence, and proceeded nobly to give expression to their belief by referring to him with bated breath as "poor Alfred," by refraining from asking him to their houses "for fear that he might meet somebody who would be rude to him," by effectually preventing him from taking any steps to rehabilitate himself on the ground that "it would only make more scandal," by giving him "good advice," and by keeping him as short of money as was possible consistently with not allowing him and his wife and children to die of starvation; the other members of his family frankly spoke of him as a murderer, and, as is the amiable wont of hostile members of a family, were more virulent about him even than outsiders. On the whole, and with all suitable reservations, we may say that a man who gets into any kind of trouble may generally be recommended to pray God to save him from his family, and the case of Monson is no exception to the general rule. The recital of the few details we have been able to gather of his life after the verdict would not be a cheerful one, and we shall not dwell on it. We shall merely say that the meagre financial support of his family did not long continue, that every time he succeeded in getting any sort of honest employment some kind Christian soul went round and denounced him as "Monson the murderer," and that finally, having been driven from pillar to post and hounded from every possibility of earning an honest living, he took to dishonest courses and was sentenced to a term of penal servitude for fraud. We do not know the details of this case, we should not be surprised to learn that he was unjustly convicted owing to the prejudice which had been excited against him, but in any case, and admitting that he was in this case rightly convicted, we shall continue to believe that he was a cruelly ill-used and martyred man. The book containing the report of the Ardlmont trial contains photographs of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Mr. Asher, the then Solicitor-General for Scotland, and Mr. Comrie Thomson. There is no photograph of Monson in the book, but we have seen one taken at the time of his trial. He was then thirty-three years of age, and we confess that as we looked at the presentment of his gay and gallant good-looks (he had a singularly beautiful and attractive face) and considered the horrible, brutal tragedy of his life, we were uncomfortably moved. We are informed that he died shortly after his release from prison, but our authority on this point is dubious, and it may be that he is still alive. If he is dead, and we hope for his own sake that he is, let this article serve as a tardy reparation offered to the memory of one of the most piteous victims of man's inhumanity to man who ever turned a face, brave, undaunted and debonnaire to the pack of howling dogs that hounded him down.

THE ATTIC MUSIC HALL

The Acharnians of Aristophanes. With Introduction, Critical Notes, and Commentary by W. RENNIE. (Arnold, 6s. net.)

ARISTOPHANES is the playground of the more human scholar, especially if he be nimble and light of hand. Without, however, affirming anything concerning Mr. Rennie's nature, it may be stated that much entertainment may be extracted from his book, at first sight unpromising for general review. Until comparatively recently in the history of scholiastic Aristophanes was regarded as a serious authority on Athenian political history. Grote was among the early exploders of that idea, but it still lingers in milder forms, and Mr. Rennie has to combat them in his Introduction. He might have gone further still, for his remarks suggest that Aristophanes had no serious political principles at all. Aristophanes was rather a pure caricaturist of manners, such as were in other arts Goya, Hoffmann—and, it may be added, is Mr. Max Beerbohm. His sole motive of the nature of principle seems to have been the most powerful motive for satirical art, personal antipathy.

A critical examination of Mr. Rennie's text, with the mass of variant readings unobtrusively printed at the foot of each page, might be too trying to the printer—perhaps to the reviewer—but it would undoubtedly be dull to most readers of THE ACADEMY. It will be sufficient to notice his list of nine codices, his reference to the important excerpts from Suidas, and his mention of the papyrus fragments recently discovered at Eschmunên. These last are particularly gratifying to scholiasts, since they confirm several of their previous conjectures. He names two or three works as specially useful, and wisely avoids too much specific reference to his predecessors, for the use of their labours is presupposed in work of this kind; but a list of authorities would have added to the usefulness of his book. A short description of the structure of the play and, of course, the larger part of his excellent commentary must be added to its more purely scholastic value. Its entertainment lies in the remainder of the Introduction and scattered through the Commentary. Though it is not his direct object to vivify Greek culture, as Professor Mahaffy has so often done, he thus arrives at the same end by his careful elucidation of the text. He creates a clear impression of the supreme art of Aristophanes, of the acute intelligence of the Athenians, and of their astonishing modernness.

Though we are secretly quite aware, it is well that we should be occasionally reminded, how vastly more intelligent the Athenians were than ourselves. A glance at Greek popular comedy drives the fact home. The chorus, an expensive item in the production of a Greek play, was provided by the State on application, at the discretion of the proper officer, except in the case of plays by Æschylus, when his authorisation was obligatory. It is possible to imagine the British democracy so endowing Shakespeare as a matter of sentiment. But the Aristophanic comedy was far less like a drama in the modern sense than a pantomime, in some respects, and a production for the music-hall stage in others. Its development also received no assistance whatever from scenery. The change of locality in The Acharnians, for instance, is frequent, and there was nothing to indicate it but the entrances and exits by one of the three doors at the back of the stage. Comprehension of the course of the play depended almost entirely on the quick wits of the audience. If the intelligence of the human race as exemplified in the Athens mob of 425 B.C. and the London mob of the present day had not vastly deteriorated, a modern Acharnians would now be drawing enormous crowds to a London music-hall, for, as Frere translates two lines in Aristophanes's play:

There's an uncommon ugly twang of pitch,
A touch of naval armament about it.

But to our slow wits such a political phantasmagoria would be totally unintelligible.

The Acharnians was Aristophanes's third play and the earliest which has been preserved intact. It was produced early in the sixth year of the Peloponnesian War, when he was somewhere about the age of twenty. He had made his first excursion into the political drama the year before with The Babylonians, a peace play running directly counter to popular sentiment, which was then so warlike that his legal representative was indicted for treason to the Demos, on the ground of the play. The Acharnians carried on the same game. Owing to military successes during the previous year the war fever was higher still; Cleon, the demagogue, Aristophanes's constant butt, was at the height of his power; and the whole play is a burlesque of Euripides, who strongly appealed to popular sentimentality. Yet the Athenian mob recognised Aristophanes's consummate art, and the play won the first prize. These are strong proofs of the aisthesus of the Attic race, its illiterate amazing perception of the elements of so subtle an art as that of caricature, and their accurate discrimination between the domain of art and politics. They were far from tolerant, but they refused to be deprived of æsthetic pleasure by political considerations.

It is impossible to follow shortly the complex story of the drama. The first part is less connected than the familiar stories of modern pantomimes, the last has no consequence at all: it is composed of a succession of harlequin scenes. The protagonist Dicaeopolis is an Attic farmer, kept in Athens by the war, detesting town life and a strong advocate of peace-at-any-price. He arrives at the Assembly much too soon, with his luncheon-basket, determined to obstruct all military proposals. When the Assembly has been opened, a professional peacemaker proposes to conduct negotiations anywhere on payment of his journey-money, and is immediately "chucked out." He is followed by Athenian ambassadors returning from the Great King with a Persian envoy. The envoy speaks an unintelligible jargon of bad Greek, which the chairmen of the Assembly interpret according to their fancy. Dicaeopolis, very angry, finds the peacemonger and commissions him to make a personal treaty for himself and family. Next arrive the Ambassador to Thrace, with a band of Thracian raiders as an earnest of more, warranted to eat up any district they may be commissioned to visit. As an example of their capacity, they seize Dicaeopolis's luncheon-basket. The peacemonger now returns with samples of treaties in bottles. Dicaeopolis chooses the Thirty-years' brand as the oldest liquor, less doctored with tar and suggestive of naval armament. He retires to his house, one of the three stage doors, to celebrate the rural festival to Dionysus. But veterans of Acharnae, full of military fervour, get wind of the bargain, and arrive to stone him. Dicaeopolis comes out, strikes a tragic attitude, and delivers a speech in the Euripidean mode, standing over his meat block and chopper in evidence of his readiness to accept martyrdom for his principles. To increase the effect he goes to Euripides's house, the centre stage door, and begs the loan of his best heroic properties. Euripides is very unwilling to part with the essence of his drama, but Dicaeopolis eventually reappears with a tattered cloak, a beggar's staff and a basket with a hole in it, full of faded greens. He then makes a speech consisting of a close burlesque of Euripides's Telephus. Part of the Acharnians are convinced, the other part fetch Lamachus, the General, violently burlesqued, in full uniform, supported by dancing girls. The two parts of the chorus, the Acharnians, then unite in a résumé of The Babylonians and an elaborate eulogy of the poet, Aristophanes. The remainder of the piece consists of a harlequinade in which Dicaeopolis and Lamachus are the contending heroes. Finally Lamachus is carried away to have his bruises dressed at a surgery, and Dicaeopolis is borne off in triumph to receive the victor's crown. The success of Dicaeopolis is quite devoid of any political or moral significance, it is purely artistic, the triumph of the funniest character, and evokes the same sort of sympathy as that of Owlglass, or the Man who could not shiver.

But Aristophanes is also a mine of information concerning the particular manners and customs of the Athenians of his period. From him more than from any other author can their daily life be reconstructed. It is Mr. Rennie's notes on such allusions which make his Commentary so interesting. He describes the peaceable and practical method by which crowds were dispersed by means of a rope steeped in red-ochre; the arrangement of the theatres; the social customs of picnics to which each guest contributed, and of symposia from which such teetotallers as then existed retired; the many and various trinkets of the women; the clothes and food of the poor and the exquisite; the hats suitable for the country and for travelling, and entirely discarded in town; the several kinds of bread; the dilution of wine; the methods of cooking flesh and fish; the sauces and the sweetmeats. The curious in cooking can try eels garnished with beet, rissoles of salt fish baked in fig leaves, hare jugged in its own blood, and tripe sauced with honey; they can speculate whether sepiæ really does signify cuttle-fish, if the Athenians regarded them as a delicacy, and whether, if echinoi means our sea-urchins, they ate them, when not compelled by blockade. Ornithologists can discuss the exact species of the attagæ which Mr. Rennie calls the francolin, Adams the godwit, and Sundevall the perdix cinerea; at any rate it appears to be excellent eating. In his introduction, again, Mr. Rennie discusses the difficult question of the Didaskolos, that legal representative who was indicted on account of Aristophanes's Babylonians, and under whose name he represented The Acharnians and other plays according to a common custom. He was certainly not an actor, but often a poet of experience, who primarily trained the chorus. In this respect the relation of the dramatist to his Didaskolos was similar to that of the architect fertile in design at the present day, who associates himself with another of more experience and less imagination to avoid the drudgery of calculation. In other respects the Didaskolos held the position of a whipping-boy or prison-editor, for he was responsible to the State and had to undergo any penalties incurred. Prizes, however, were given under the name of both, and it seems that the Didaskolos received the money reward as payment for his training of the chorus.

But since at the present time the political element is more evident in the English drama in the pantomimes and more strongly and continuously on the music hall stage, a point of contact between the latter and the Aristophanic comedy must be noticed, their relative morality. The Pharisaic feeling which dominates the County Council in its control of the music halls, by turning its attention solely to respectability, blinds it to morality. With the exception of the English Restoration drama the Aristophanic comedy is probably the coarsest represented on any stage at any period, but it is far less incitive to vice than the music hall stage has been rendered by the Council. The jests of the Aristophanic comedy, however broad, appeal entirely to an intellectual faculty, the sense of humour. The County Council has eliminated the gaiety from the music hall stage, and left the human organism, however respectably concealed, its sole appeal to the carnal senses. Fortunately, the Aristophanic comedians of the present day are skilful enough to divert part of the attention of their audience from such morose delectation, by the fescennine wit which they insinuate impromptu, and the Council is too stupid to observe.

A GROUP OF PHILOSOPHERS

Essays on Literature. By EDWARD CAIRD, LL.D., D.C.L., late Master of Balliol. (James Maclehose and Sons, Glasgow, 5s.)

THE exceptionally lucid and unfettered style which characterises this series of essays and lectures renders it well worthy of re-issue after a period of seventeen years. The name of the writer is an honoured one in the realm of philosophic literature, and among those to whom his works are familiar is in itself a guarantee that whatever subject is dealt with will receive a breadth of knowledge and a sureness of touch—due to knowledge rightly applied—which will go far to give it a strong interest, whether the reader be in concord or of a divergent opinion. Philosophy is a term which conveys to the uninitiated too vague a meaning to be of any essential use; the dictionary helps him but little, since "the science of being as being" or "the knowledge of the causes and laws of all phenomena" can hardly be said to be definitions which illuminate with particular brilliance the confused shadow-show of ideas which appears at the sound of the word; therefore, we may as well set on record a brief statement of the sphere and the reasonableness of this science of humanity that occurs in an essay, entitled "The Problem of Philosophy at the Present Time":

The task of philosophy is to gain, or rather perhaps to regain, such a view of things as shall reconcile us to the world and to ourselves. The need for philosophy arises out of the broken harmony of a spiritual life, in which the different elements or factors seem to be set in irreconcilable opposition to each other; in which, for example, the religious consciousness, the consciousness of the infinite, is at war with the secular consciousness, the consciousness of the finite; or, again, the consciousness of the self with the consciousness of the external world. It is easy to see this, if we reflect on the nature of the controversies which most trouble us at present. They all, directly or indirectly, turn upon the difficulty of reconciling the three great terms of thought—the world, self, and God—the difficulty of carrying out to their legitimate consequences what seem to be our most firmly based convictions as to any one of these factors in our intellectual life, without rejecting in whole or in part the claims of the others.

Dr. Caird admits that even this is too lax an indication, and proceeds to elaborate his argument in a masterly fashion; but the sentences quoted serve our purpose as manifesting the general trend of all these essays. Whether the author discusses Wordsworth and his Nature-philosophy, or Carlyle in his sartorial fantasies, or Goethe, or even—as in the opening paper—Dante, his view-point is the philosophical one rather than that of the poetic enthusiast or the literary critic. The temptation to range among the more flowery by-paths—some would call them the highways—of belles-lettres must at times have been hard to resist; there are traces of self-control in this matter in the wholly charming essay on Wordsworth; but the line of thought and reasoning throughout is clearly conceived and finely expressed. Two persons so dissimilar as the poet of our English lakes and Jean Jacques Rousseau are the subjects of some very interesting analyses wherein the points of contact between them—their love of Nature and their desire to loosen the complicated fetters of too stern a system of education and civilisation—are excellently noted. Of Rousseau Dr. Caird says:

It was the revolt of his whole soul against the life and culture of Paris that gave such force and intensity to his denunciation of the evils of an artificial civilisation, and to his prophetic call to a perverse generation to return to Nature. Forced back upon himself he sought in his visions a compensation for his practical incapacity either to conform himself to the world, or the world to himself, and "while he was musing the fire burned." Rousseau, in fact, was rather like a Hebrew prophet under an ecstasy of inspiration than a literary man setting himself a definite task.

The consideration of Dante in his relation to theology and ethics—the introductory essay to which we have referred—is a fine piece of exposition, and concludes with a passage which seems to us to sum up that poet and indicate his true place in religious history with a precision which leaves nothing more to be said:

In spite of the horrors of his Inferno, which are the poetic reflection of the superstitious terrors of a half-barbarous age, and in spite of the monastic austerity and purity of his Paradise of light and music, which is like a glorified edition of the services of the Church, Dante interprets the religion of the cloister in such a way as to carry us beyond it. His Divina Commedia may be compared to the portal of a great cathedral, through which we emerge from the dim religious light of the Middle Ages into the open day of the modern world, but emerge with the imperishable memory of those harmonies of form and colour on which we have been gazing, and with the organ notes that lifted our soul to heaven still sounding in our ears.

The second essay, "Goethe and Philosophy," is made the occasion for a scholarly disquisition on the relation between philosophy and poetry in which the author is, perhaps, at his best, and which we should like to quote were it not so unfair to abstract disjointed paragraphs from a coherent and pleasing whole. In his closing essay on "The Genius of Carlyle" Dr. Caird, in our opinion, is not quite so happy; he emphasises too heavily the idea that a great proportion of Carlyle's work is now out-of-date, that it sufficed only for the grievances of the philosopher's own day and generation. The question is whether work informed by such tremendous energy can ever be out-of-date—whether it does not assume a different but equal quality of value from the perspective of time. Swift and Addison are most decidedly out-of-date and behind the times, but we cannot afford to discard their writings, neither does it seem particularly profitable to study them from the standpoint of their moral lessons or their political designs, save for the economist, the moralist, or the historian. But they wrote English, of an excellence! This, however, is the only thing that strikes us as a trifle out of place in Dr. Caird's admirable volume, and we may conclude by saying that it is one of those books, full of fruitful ideas and luminous reasoning, which no student of the higher branches of literature should miss—whether he incline to philosophy or not.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Arrows in the Dark. By SOPHIE COLE. (Mills and Boon, 6s.)

THE idea that a woman should publish after the death of her husband (a great pianist) the love-letters which other women had written to him—publish them in book-form for the sake of money—is rather dreadful, but there are possibilities in it for the novelist. From such possibilities the author of "Arrows in the Dark" has constructed a really clever and interesting story. The disagreeable contingencies which in unskilled hands might easily have made it repellent are avoided, and if we are forced to consider the widow as a too consistently heartless person who does not receive her deserts we must admit that she is admirably drawn and that her scheming makes an effective foil for the ingenuous hero of the book. Naturally, the letters when given to the surprised world of London cause an immense sensation, and, although the signatures are, of course, omitted, several ladies whose notions of virtue are not cast in any rigid mould suffer a considerable amount of discomposure at finding their effusions in print. Even the school-girl adoration of Marjorie, the plucky little heroine, is reproduced pitilessly. She is set up in business in Bond Street by Tom Trevor, who has the misfortune to be cousin to one of the least discreet of the amorous butterflies, and the relations which arise between these three persons form a vital part of the book. Marjorie loves Tom, Tom loves Eugénie, Eugénie loves the memory of the dead musician as far as she can be said to love at all; and so the comedy is played until, with Marjorie's death, tragedy appears. The plot is exceptionally well evolved, and the whole story, both in its main theme and in its side-issues, holds the reader's attention from first to last. We congratulate the author on a romance which is much above the average merit.

Wax. By GEORGE SOMES LAYARD. (Allen and Sons, 6s.)

THE possibilities of mesmerism and of hypnotic suggestion are very cleverly exploited in this story, and Mr. Layard certainly deserves praise for having conceived original predicaments for his characters, if not an original plot. But we fear that the overpowering improbability of the whole affair, while adding a piquancy to the book for indulgent and uncritical readers, will detract from its pleasure for those whose demands are somewhat sterner. The heroine, shut up in Madame Tussaud's Exhibition for a night, masquerading in the robe of Mary Queen of Scots; the silly young fireman of Tussaud's staff who adores the wax figure, talks to it, and is a "medium"; George Bellairs, permitting himself to be hypnotised, and placing himself completely in the power of a man who was neither a doctor nor an intimate friend—all these make very pretty material for complications, but must be regarded as rather farcical when offered as participants in a romance of London. The author would have done better had he evolved some other career for the little people of his mind—the opening chapters are so good that the plunge into "waxworks" and "mesmerism" strikes us as very disappointing and degenerative.

We note that Mr. Layard, in two or three places, chides his characters on points of grammar and choice of language. He should, therefore, be more careful himself. On page 154 we have a bad flaw: "The army of day-attendants was coming in to make their charges presentable for the day." If the word "their" refers to the "night-watchmen" in the preceding clause, it is too far separated from its antecedent. In another place this irritating sentence occurs: "The matters which had lately got themselves into such a jumble, or been got, if you like to have it so, by the Spirit of Mischief, had to get themselves marshalled and collocated." "Or been got" is most distressing. To contrast with these unpleasant lapses there are many pages where ideas and language are quite beautifully mated, pages which are charming to read. Mr. Layard's chief failing in this novel seems to be that of a too saltatory imagination; perhaps in his next work, if it should be in the field of fiction and not in his other chosen realm of letters, he will repress that imagination for the benefit of readers who have been led to expect from him something above the "popular" level.

The End and the Beginning. By COSMO HAMILTON. (Mills and Boon, 3s. 6d.)

EVEN if it were not definitely stated that in due time this novel is to form the basis of a play the fact would be sufficiently apparent from internal evidence to anyone of ordinary acumen. The entire story acts itself, if we may be permitted the expression—sets itself into a series of distinct scenes, and the reader can very easily catch the illusion that he is watching the stage, listening to the dialogue, savouring the critical "situations." It follows, therefore, as the book is written by no inexperienced hand, that what it loses from a literary point of view it gains in dramatic force, in crispness, in concentration; in a word, it "goes." It follows, equally, that in criticising the style we can hardly employ the usual standards by which novels are judged, since this one naturally tells its tale almost entirely by means of reported conversations. There is no need for hesitation, however, on the part of the reader who desires a "good story," for, once begun, this little study will scarcely be laid down until the last word has been read. We term it a study, since it seems to be a sincere attempt to express the relation between master and man at a crisis of industrial affairs; between the chief of a large business concern and the thousands of men dependent upon him—men deluded by the cant of Socialism, deciding fatuously to strike work while receiving good pay from a good master. Necessarily, there is no striving here after fine or subtle characterisation. The actors—a most suitable word—are broadly and effectively differentiated, and at least two or three of them are familiar figures; we have Edward Chard, the "strong," square-jawed, unyielding man; Alf, the young Cockney workman, with his shag tobacco and his slangy phrases; Tapper, the tubby little "comic relief," who, when presumably asleep and suddenly kissed by his wife, exclaims: "More luck!"—the pit will overflow with giggles at this, of course; and other reminiscent characters are deftly put through their paces. We write this in no depreciatory mood—they are by no means lifeless puppets, and if the humour is, on occasion, palpably of the kind to catch a guffaw from the mixed audience of a theatre that is a fault which in such a book we suppose must be condoned. The title of the story seems totally inadequate and meaningless, and the finish is an obvious "curtain" which reads rather weakly. For an hour's entertainment however, unflagging and vivid, the book is capital, and our final judgment must coincide with the clapping of hands which it will certainly win when staged.

Eliza Brightwen: The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist. Edited by W. H. CHESSE. With Introduction and Epilogue by EDMUND GOSSE. (T. Fisher Unwin, 5s. net.)

"THIS little book," writes Mr. Gosse, "in its simplicity, its naïveté, will not be comprehended by any but those who are already in sympathy with its author and in measure conversant with her methods." We may accept this statement unreservedly, while adding that those readers to whom the name of Mrs. Brightwen is familiar as a household word—and there are, happily, many such—will be grateful for this simple and unpretentious record. It might, perhaps, have been wished that Mr. Chesson, to whom the practical editorship of the volume was assigned, had seen fit to exercise a more rigorous supervision. A few of the entries are of too trivial a character to warrant publication, and the inclusion of the full text of the "Holy City" was surely unnecessary, since the words are only too familiar to everyone of us. On the other hand, it must be admitted that Mr. Chesson has performed his task with scrupulous conscientiousness, and his foot-notes are occasionally of considerable value.

This book is the story of a quiet life devoted to noble ends. It is diversified by no startling incidents. Of an essentially modest and retiring disposition, Mrs. Brightwen shrank from publicity. She was an influence rather a force. Of the first fifty years of her life little need be said. She married—happily, it would appear, if not romantically. She was to a large extent the slave of her temperament, and only the prolonged illness of her husband roused her to a sense of her responsibilities. George Brightwen died in 1883, and with his death the centre of interest shifted for his widow. Always a keen student of natural history, she began to collect and classify the results of her observation. She acquired, not without difficulty, the art of writing. Hence those five or six books on animal life which have proved the unflinching delight of so many children. Her studies were distinguished for their accuracy if not for their originality. She owed little or nothing to books, and was frequently unaware that her "discoveries" were mere commonplaces to the scientific expert. This ignorance, however, was not without its advantages. For by its means she was enabled to revolutionise the teaching of natural history. She brought science into the nursery, and it may not unfairly be claimed for her that she trained many hundreds of children in habits of observation and accuracy, while instilling into them a deep feeling for Nature.

Much of this book is concerned with the irrelevant—tea-meetings, Bible classes, Church services, and such like. Mrs. Brightwen's piety, though unquestionably deep-rooted and sincere, is apt at times to become a little oppressive. But those pages of the narrative which deal with the author's work as a naturalist are full of interest and charm, and there is an atmosphere of kind-heartedness and simple goodness which is never absent.

A CORNISH BAY

FACING the summer sunset it lies, open to the winter billows and the August calms, yet secure from the direct affront of blustering south-west gales; and into its tranquil hollow, as if for shelter, flower after flower has crept and taken hold. First the heather—so sturdy and inured that he had small need of protection, for many storms could not loosen his grasp—they passed over, leaving him unharmed, with the wind singing through his dense clusters; but the little bay grew fond of his firm, sweet tangle and his bluff way with the wind that so disturbed her peace, so she let him stay, and from rock to rock he sprinkled a pink foam of blossom. Then the foxgloves, dainty, trim and tall, peered over, and presently in groups of three or four they wandered down the crannied cliffs until one year not long ago they bent and nodded to see their rich mauve bells mirrored for the first time in the crystal light of a sunny, shallow pool. They were too beautiful to be driven back and broken at the mercy of any gusty hour. Crowding to the edge came wild roses, their pale, wondering faces turned towards the dreamy blue below; here and there, wherever he could find a space, the small golden eye of the strawberry-flower peeped shyly between; the fine tendrils of the pea, with her slender fairy blooms "on tiptoe for a flight," twined closely round everything she touched, fearing to be left behind. Through the dark undergrowth writhed the convolvulus, marking his path to right and left by snowflakes rosy-tipped; and the little bay welcomed them all until they travelled down and down and dared to whisper and laugh at the very edge of the beach itself. So the cleft in the coast became a God's garden, far from the towns of men.

On a summer evening we stood on the cliff and looked into the lovely depth, resting eyes and soul, although for a minute our hearts might have beaten more quickly with the thrill of it all. The tremulous border of the rising tide had encroached upon more than half of that narrow semi-circle of sand; its faint surge mingled with the screams of gulls at play, whirls of white specks against the headland. Nature was reduced to her primal earth, air, water, and the fire in the western sky, and something of that elemental simplicity seemed to enter into the spirit, for as by an actual stretch of arms a robe is flung from the shoulders, so the discomfort of too careful thoughts slipped from us. For once, things seen were greater than things unseen—unless it was that the visible splendour brought us more closely into relation with the beauty invisible which we can apprehend so seldom.

As the evening advanced the sea grew calmer. Petals of flowers bent inward, forming cups for the dew; buds which were nearly unfolded stayed their greeting for the morning light; the wild bees boomed contentedly homeward. Between its brown arms the little bay gathered sheaves of sunbeams—the golden pathway trembled straightly and fairly to the far horizon.

We followed the winding foot-track and adventured upon its surface in a boat, to discover sights and sounds and fragrances that were unsuspected from the vantage of the high ground. The nearer water changed to green, and only in the middle distance did that limpid blue expanse begin that blends into the narrow indigo line of the western ocean. From that cool, clear depth the rough rocks rose like broad bastions of a citadel guarding the gentle valleys within; into it they descended, still discernible, with many a spur and pinnacle uplifting shaggy heads as though in protest against the silent, inevitable oblivion of the incoming tide. Now and then the edge of the water showed a peculiar agitation; pulling a few strokes nearer to find the reason of it, we heard queer, hollow words being blown from crevices and tiny caverns into the sea with a petulant swirl of white foam; they might have been the muffled voices of resentful, half-articulate monsters aroused from their sleep. One by one they were silenced and drowned, leaving behind a few pale, irregular lines of floating froth, as though the dying voices had written their pining in mysterious runes on the surface of the water; but the writing soon passed. Another soft noise, repeated at changing intervals, had an eerie effect on the brain; it was the detonation of the under-swell in the recesses of a cave, each sullen boom followed by a volley of shed drops that echoed musically out to the wide spaces of air.

From our boat we could see the gleaming ribbon of the beach gradually narrowing, until the dark ridge of dry, withered weed, with its litter of wicker crab-pots, its odd pieces of driftwood from wrecks of long ago, the winning-mark of the tide, was nearly awash. So fair was the sky that even then the sun was dazzling to look upon with unshaded glance as he approached the sea's rim. The innumerable tints and ochreous shades of the cliffs became intensified into patches of deep, definite colour—arabesques of red, brown, yellow, pointed streaks of green where the fingers of the land had reached out over the dizzy height and touched the rocks into life, specks of solitary ferns, growing between flakes of the very stone—all merged and set into a magnificent natural mosaic. Through the last long minutes of sunlight the hues deepened, the reds becoming more lucent, as a dark red rose held in the crimson rays will appear a flower of flame. So strong and steady, so sentient was the lift of the tide, that from the boat it seemed as though the waters were ascending to engulf the great sun as they had already engulfed the boulders and outer ramparts of the land; seemed that they might rise, and rise indefinitely, until the boat swayed with us alone at the centre of a vast, sunless, shoreless circle of sea and sky.

The sun dipped and disappeared, glorious to the end in his farewell; for the last time to-day the wet ledges and sombre roofs of the caves glimmered with the wavering web of reflected rays. As the shadow of one's hand will deaden a bunch of delicate flowers, so the colours of the cliffs suddenly ceased to glow; they took to themselves instead a tinge of strong purple and warm grey that all the high, pure radiance from the north-west to the zenith could not redeem. Darker and darker grew the air, as though veil after veil of gauze were being slowly, silently floated over the earth, her coverlets for the night. Cool breaths came and went across the sea, ruffling it as with the gloom of unseen wings; the rocks became significant, uncanny, assuming mammoth shapes as of great, grave, slumbering bodies thrust far into the deep. If they should wake, we thought, and move? Ripples that were unheard in the broad light murmured softly from the bows. The seabirds were strangely quiet, ranged in sentinel rows in front of their stony resting-places, white points upon a purple gloom. It was time to turn homeward.

Standing on the shingle, we could glimpse the whole bay, silvery, hushed and dim as a bay in dreamland. Two or three faint sounds emphasised the stillness; the listless splash of a tiny wave; the quaint, intermittent stridulation of a grasshopper in the heather a few feet away; the rustle and cheep of an invisible, drowsy bird. The sea, touching the fringe of that thin, dry belt of weed, paused as though waiting for a whispered word. For it was high tide.

RONSARD'S "MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS"

It is to be hoped that the cheap reprint of a selection from the chief lyrical poems of Ronsard and the leading poets of his school, carefully introduced and edited by M. Auguste Dorchain, may be the means of arousing an interest in this celebrated poet, who has a peculiar fascination for English and for Scottish readers.

Born in 1524, near Vendôme, Pierre de Ronsard was for a time attached to the French Court, afterwards spending three years at the Court of Scotland, at the end of which term he transferred his services to the Duke of Orleans; but having lost his hearing he gave himself up almost entirely to the composition of lyrical poetry, earning for himself the title of the Prince of Poets, being the chief of the cluster of seven contemporary poets known in literary history as the Pleiade. Ronsard helped to introduce important changes in the idiom of the French language, as well as in the rhythm of French poetry.

When James the Fifth of Scotland gallantly married the hapless Madeleine of Valois, the youthful Ronsard, then a page in the household of her brother, the Duke of Orleans, transferred his services to the young Queen and accompanied her to Scotland. After her death he remained at Edinburgh for nearly three years, during which time he read the Greek and Latin classics, and studied under a Scotsman whose name is not given, but which it would be interesting to know, if any literary antiquary could dig it out of the ruins of the past. The King could not prevail on Ronsard to remain in Scotland, but it was afterwards the poet's fate to meet the daughter of James—Mary Queen of Scots—in France, and it was at her desire that he published his first volume of poems.

Ronsard addressed some of his finest sonnets to Queen Mary, and when she was a prisoner in England he wrote impassioned verses imploring the French to take up arms for her deliverance. Queen Elizabeth, jealous of Ronsard's affection for the Queen of Scots, strove hard to detach him from her rival, but in vain; for Ronsard was a whole-hearted and big-brained Mariolater, and the first of the cult whose worship took a distinctly literary form, his countryman and contemporary, Brantôme, being an easy second. Ronsard died in 1585, while Mary was still a prisoner in England, but within two years of her release by means of the scaffold at Fotheringay.

It was during the brief reign of Francis, Mary's first husband, that Ronsard found a patroness and protectress in the young Queen, who urged him to publish the first collected edition of his works in 1560—the year, by the way, in which the Reformation became an accomplished fact in Scotland, and stern, sullen Presbyterianism was set up in place of lax and gay Romanism. Ronsard's poetry had originally been published, the Hymns in 1555, and the continuation of the Amours in 1556, and dedicated to the beautiful Marguerite of France, afterwards Duchess of Savoy.

But before the poet was able to present Mary with a copy of the last volume she was a widow and an ex-Queen, and had departed for Scotland to seek that crown which was to sit longer but less lightly on her fair head than the diadem of the realm she had left behind. Ronsard's grief at the young Queen's departure from France, which he seems to have witnessed, had been feelingly described in a long poem which Miss Castello has translated in one of her elegant books.

The fine sonnet which Ronsard wrote when Mary was a captive is also in his best style, both as a poet and as a worshipper of the unfortunate Queen. In impassioned verses he calls upon the men of France to remember their chivalry, and to fly to the rescue of the hapless lady:

Encores que la mer de bien loins nous separe, etc.,

which Miss Castello translates in this manner:

Although the envious seas divide us far,
Thine eye, heaven's brightest, most immortal star,
Will not consent that time nor space should sever,
From the heart that is thine own for ever.

O queen! who hold'st in bonds so rare a queen,
Thy counsels change, assuage thy bitter ire!
The sun in all its course has never seen,
A deed so foul, so vengeful, and so dire!

Degenerate race! what mean those shining arms
Which Renaul, Lancelot, Orlando bore?
The helpless sex they should protect from harms,

But lo! they can oppose, defend, no more!
Rust, ye vain trophies, idle useless all,— France has no sons to win a queen from thrall!

But even before Burke's time the age of chivalry had passed, and the Renauls, Lancelots, and Orlandos, if there were any such in France, made no effort to break the chains of the fair captive who was languishing in prison, and Elizabeth, notwithstanding the appeal made to her in the fifth line:

O queen! who hold'st in bonds so rare a queen:
(Reine, qui enfermez une reine si rare,)—

was unwilling to let her prisoner go.

Mary did not forget her poetical champion. In 1583, in the sixteenth year of her captivity, she sent to him, as a mark of her admiration of his gifts and as a token of her gratitude for his faithfulness, a magnificent cupboard, surmounted with a rock representing Parnassus, with Pegasus springing from the fount of Hippocrene, and bearing this inscription:

A Ronsard, l'Apollon de la Source des Muses.

Although the fact is ignored by most historians of Scotland, including Hill Burton, who gaily sends his readers to the lively pages of Brantôme, it is worth while relating that a French gentleman, Chastelard by name, who was condemned to death for having been found hidden in Queen Mary's bedchamber, refused all ghostly comfort at the scaffold, asking only to be allowed to read the Hymn de la Mort by Ronsard, the much-loved poet of her for whose sake he was about to die an ignominious death. Chastelard met his death gallantly like a true knight-errant, turning in the direction of his bright particular star, though it was obscured from view, and did not hear him addressing her as the most lovely and cruel of her sex. It is worth noting, by the way, that Chastelard is the title of one of the three poems forming Mr. Swinburne's Marian trilogy.

In 1584, with exquisite taste and diplomatic delicacy, Ronsard removed from the last edition of his works the name of the Earl of Leicester, Queen Elizabeth's old favourite, and the eulogy he had written on that unfortunate nobleman; for our poet had lived too long at the subtle Court of France and the stormy Court of Scotland not to know whom to eulogise and whom to ignore, and when and where. Witness his address to Mary:

Je n'ay voulu, Madame, que ce livre Passast le mer, etc.,

in the course of which he goes on to say:

My book, 'twere hard if England claimed thee all,
And thou from Scotland should too long delay,
Where, ready at thy mistress' slightest call,
Thou may'st thy tender, dutious homage pay.

Then shalt thou, happy far beyond thy race,
Behold two Queens whom the same seas enclose,
Whose fame their billows would in vain oppose,
Which fills the universe and boundless space!

'Tis meet that, since for both I frame these lays,
They should each separate beauty fitly praise;
That each should at her feet the gift survey,
Which shall the bard's devoted zeal display.

Besides, Queen Elizabeth, like Queen Mary, was a competitor for Ronsard's favour. The English Queen could not but admire his faithfulness to her rival. On one occasion, Elizabeth sent Ronsard a diamond of great value, comparing its lustre and brilliancy to the charm and sparkle of his divine poesy. She could never forget the beautiful lines he had addressed to her on the occasion of the treaty of peace with France in 1565, in which, after having proudly, but not too aggressively, affirmed his patriotism, Ronsard extolled the union and friendship of the two nations in some eloquent verses, which may be given in the original:

N'offensez point par armes ni par noise,
Si m'en croyez, la province gauloise
Les Gaulois semble au saule verdissant;
Plus on le coupe et plus il est naissant,
Et rejettone en branches davantage,
Prenant vigneur de son propre domnage.
Pour ce, vivez comme amiables sœurs:
Par les combats les sceptres ne sont sœurs.
Quand vous serez ensemble bien unies,
L'amour, la Foi, deux belles compagnies,
Viendron ca-bas le cœur vous schaufter
Puis, sans harnois, sans armes et sans fer,
Et-sans le dos d'un carslet vous ceindre,
Ferez vos noms par toute Europe craindre,
Et l'age d'or verra de toutes parts
Fleurir les lys entre les leopards.

Ronsard, therefore, as we see by these lines, and by those given above, was not only a Mariolater, but one of the precursors of l'entente cordiale, and the only real singer who has voiced the aspirations of those strenuous workers who strove and are striving—and long may they strive and thrive!—to bring about a better understanding between two great peoples, who, even in literary matters, owe much to each other.

MILTON AND DR. JOHNSON

If sympathy with the subject is necessary to a biographer Johnson should have left the blind poet alone, for probably the ages have not produced a man so antipathetically antagonistic in character to Milton, unless it be the present occupant of St. Peter's chair into whose utterances the following and similar passages might be interpolated without in any way disturbing their unity: "If every dreamer of innovations may propagate his projects, there can be no settlement; if every murmurer at government may diffuse discontent, there can be no peace; and if every sceptic in theology may teach his follies, there can be no religion. The remedy against these evils is to punish the authors; for it is yet allowed that every society may punish, though not prevent, the publication of opinions which that society shall think pernicious; but this punishment, though it may crush the author, promotes the book, and it seems not more reasonable to leave the right of printing unrestrained, because writers may be afterwards censured, than it would be to sleep with doors unbolted, because by our laws we can hang a thief," though His Holiness might justly complain that he is not allowed to punish without adverse comment. That such antagonism should exist between natures both possessing a firm and reverent belief, a love of freedom only second to it, a grand personal independence, a common delight in the classics, and both sufferers from physical infirmity, seems at first an incongruity; but if, against the former quotation we place Milton's reference to Charles' execution as a glorious action which freed the people from slavery and was the outcome of its own greatness of mind, we have the key-note of the discord which clashes only the more harshly for the harmonious similarity in taste that appeared to precede it.

Johnson looked at all the objects around him straightly in the face and saw the incarnation of his beloved liberty only in law and order; the physically blind poet saw only Freedom unincarnate, and believed "Who loves that, must first be wise and good," and he thunders at those who misuse it that they mean licence when they cry Liberty, disgusted and in anger, that loosed from bondage they do not press forward on his own ideal path.

To the practical common-sense of Johnson, who tells us further on that "A state of innocence we can only conceive, if indeed, in our present misery, it be possible to conceive it," a belief that human nature could run ideally straight without leading strings, must have appeared inadmissably childish, and he constantly suspects the poet's sincerity in consequence. Virtue could scarcely have ever had two more honest votaries, yet the later worshipper finds his teeth set on edge by every trifling word and act of the earlier; in every paragraph we see the earnest struggle of the truly honest man to be just in spite of the insinuating encroachments of an all-powerful prejudice, and the presentment of this intensely human conflict is so vivid that as we finish reading the life we feel that, even if Boswell had never existed, from it alone we should have gained an intimate acquaintance with the author.

It is a triumph for "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" that they should have charmed the prejudice to slumber for a while, but it stirs restlessly towards the end of his criticism, and knows not whether the characters are kept sufficiently apart. But in this case it is not so much prejudice as his own natural love of hard outlines, and ignorance of the melting interweaving of light and shadow, which not only prevented him from seeing that there should be "some melancholy in the mirth" was truth to Nature, but robbed his own poetry of human attraction.

"Lycidas" is torn in pieces, "Comus" is "a drama in the epic style, inelegantly splendid, and tediously instructive," and none ever wished "Paradise Lost" longer than it is, winds up so expressive of his own prejudice that one is lost in admiration of the previous attempt—even if not considered very successful—to be just and appreciative.

But amongst all those little quips of malice two gross accusations stand out—that he sold his services, and his flatteries, to a tyrant, "of whom it was evident that he could do nothing lawful"; and "that he felt not so much the love of liberty as repugnance to authority."

To realise how these accusations were made with absolute honesty and good faith is to see how identical plants can be affected by different soil. Milton's independence was primarily mental, submitting only to the right; he demanded that his own conscience should be the arbiter. To him Cromwell was the defender of that liberty of conscience, and his rule, usurped or not, its continued defence; to him the one slavery was interference with the freedom of conscience that assured the administration of the laws could be carried through by any just man or men.

Johnson's independence was very practical. As Carlyle says, his pitching away the shoes which the Gentleman Commoner placed at his door is the type of his life. He saw no liberty outside the established law and order of things, but he demanded his own private independence of action, and it is quite open to suspicion that sooner than wear those boots, he would have been ready to execute and revile his King. To him their acceptance seemed like beggary; he could not quite rise to the spirit in which they were offered, and remember that though he, a servitor, had to rise early, the donor had risen still earlier to place them at his door. He could not quite forgive the possession of wealth, or understand "that a grateful mind by owing owes not, but still pays, at once indebted and discharged"; and we admire his tenacity, his solid, fighting stubbornness.

Milton's love of independence led him to call Cromwell the "Father of his Country," and end with "Paradise Regained"; Johnson's led him to write of his publisher, "Tonson, a man who is to be praised as often as he is named," and to end with a dictionary.

Free will is another point where this curious sameness of sentiment and divergence of development comes out markedly, with Milton it is ever looked at from high range of thought—"I made him just and right, sufficient to have stood, though free to fall."

The abstract ideal is ever more real to him than its incarnation in his visible surroundings, it is discussed in Heaven, he does not trace its working and struggling in the human reasoning and acts any more than his predestination reaches its logical result as a guiding theory of human action, in the fatalism of the East.

Johnson sees it in its effects on human action, and in one great line, "Daring, though calm; and vigorous, though resigned," expresses how the influence of a belief in it reveals itself in human action. Taken from the prologue of his tragedy, "Irene," its story, the Christian Greeks against the Turk, has evidently led him into a consideration of fatalism and, perhaps unconsciously to himself, by the two qualifying adjectives and the concretion of the metaphysical into conduct, he succeeds in drawing his beloved sharp line of demarcation even across the coalescing waters of destiny and foreknowledge.

The daring of the fatalist is unquestioned, nothing he does or leaves undone can alter the hour of his death, fixed since time began; the man who believes his will and reason free to act on and form his circumstance adds to daring the calm which makes and accepts opportunity; he uses his vigour to its uttermost, and knowing he has done all in man's power is prepared to meet death with the resigned bravery that robs the victor of his triumph and failure of its sting, utterly different from the fate-acceptance which is a despair of self-help and steals the vitality from the spring of action.

His sincerity is undoubtable, so also his prejudice, when we compare what he says of Milton's service to Cromwell with the charitable excuses that he makes for Addison's acceptance of the secretaryship to Wharton; but once, indeed, the kin of authorship raises him above it and what secrets of his own heart, its hopes and confidences, is he not telling us when he wrote, "Fancy can hardly forbear to conjecture with what temper Milton surveyed the silent progress of his work, and marked its reputation stealing its way, in a kind of subterraneous current, through fear and silence. I cannot but conceive him calm and confident, little disappointed, not at all dejected, relying on his own merit with steady consciousness, and waiting without impatience the vicissitudes of opinion, and the impartiality of a future generation"?

CORRESPONDENCE

A PRIMER OF POETRY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—People who are discontented with the mechanical prosody of our grammars often ask where they can procure more satisfactory guidance, and the question is not easily answered. In this country there is hardly to be found a handbook which deals adequately with the subject. Prof. Saintsbury's "History of Prosody" is, of course, a work very different in conception. American students are more fortunate; they can choose among several unpretentious, but trustworthy, manuals. One such is "English Verse," by Raymond MacDonald Alden (Holt and Co., New York, 1903), which contains well-chosen examples, along with a few pages of lucid theoretical exposition. Much more to the purpose, however, and likely to meet the wants of advanced students, as well as beginners, is a new book by the same writer, entitled "An Introduction to Poetry: for Students of English Literature" (same publishers, 1909). Whether the book is on sale in England I do not know, but trust that arrangements will be made for supplying a not improbable demand.

It is much more than a treatise on versification. Of its six chapters the first three—nearly half the book—deal with substance rather than form. In this way are discussed, briefly, but competently, such questions as: What is poetry?—is it wholly mimetic?—is metrical form essential to it?—also its origin, its division into such branches as Epic, Lyric, Dramatic, etc., the function of imagination, the relations between poetry and beauty, and between poetry and truth, its special subject-matter, its appropriate style, and so forth. In each discussion reference is made to the opinions of leading critics from Aristotle downward. This is a noteworthy feature of the book, and makes it not merely a record of the author's own views, but a guide to those of others, thus forming a compendious introduction to the whole subject. Throughout these chapters the author's judgments strike one as eminently sane and level-headed, while the citations and bibliography give every reader a chance of testing these by reference to the highest authorities; anyone who carries out this latter process thoroughly will have little left to learn so far as books can teach.

But it is probably the last three chapters—dealing with rhythm, metres, feet, rhyme, and assonance, stanza-form, etc.—which will be found both most interesting to the critic and most useful to the learner. The discussion of rhythm is particularly good, holding the balance between rival theories, not making "accents" or "stresses" the beginning and end of the matter, recognising the importance of time-measure, taking due account of "rests," and distinguishing between the methods of music and of verse. Those who were interested by recent discussions in our correspondence columns will like to read the following sentences: "Two streams of sound pass constantly through the inner ear of one who understands or appreciates the rhythm of our verse; one, never actually found in the real sounds which are uttered, is the absolute rhythm, its equal time-intervals moving on in infinitely perfect progression; the other, represented by the actual movement of the verse, is constantly shifting by quickening, retarding, strengthening or weakening its sounds, yet always hovers along the line of the perfect rhythm, and bids the ear refer to that perfect rhythm the succession of its pulsations."

Elsewhere the writer speaks of rhythm as a chain of innumerable equal links moving past the artist at a fixed rate of speed, into which he inserts sounds, without altering the speed further than by slight temporary accelerations or retardations; and points out that while a musician can create sounds of exactly the required duration a poet must choose among previously existing sounds and take those that come nearest to what he wants. So, in his former book, he had stated that "the sounds of verse have constantly to effect a compromise between the typical rhythm to which they are set and the irregular stress- and time-variations of human speech." These sentences, in my belief, go pretty near the root of the matter.

Equally well-balanced are the pronouncements on feet and metres. "In actual usage, the term 'foot' stands for the blending of two different entities, or for either alone: the time-interval which is the unit of the rhythm, and the group of syllables which normally fill that time-interval." Iambic and trochaic lines produce different effects, though their rhythmic structure is identical. Variations of form usually correspond to changes of emotion. Verse "is not well read when a listener cannot distinguish it from prose." Our chief metres are well illustrated, both by description and quotation, reference being sometimes made to the previous volume for fuller examples. "Rime" is shortly dealt with, while on "tone-quality" the writer preserves a judicious intermediacy between the somewhat excessive claims advanced for suggestiveness in sounds and the perhaps no less extravagant rejection of those claims altogether. The classification of stanza-forms, while not professing to be exhaustive, is sufficient; the sonnet, for example, is treated briefly, but with clear perception of the main issues. Wide reading combines with careful analysis to make these pages valuable. No two prosodists will ever wholly agree, and I should like to have found a line of demarcation drawn between the genuine trisyllabic foot and its simulacrum when three syllables are taken in the normal time of two, while perhaps an obiter dictum here and there may be open to challenge. But as regards main lines of thought the positions adopted seem demonstrably sound.

On the whole, it would be hard to find a book which can be placed with equal confidence in the hands of pupils, while examination of its contents will repay experts. I trust that its merits may receive due recognition, here, and in the country of its origin. Its author hails from California, and is a University teacher in that State.

T. S. OMOND.

MR. ARCHER'S TWO GUINEAS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—As a regular reader of your charmingly controversial and critical paper I hope you may be able to find room for a few remarks anent a certain advertisement you have rather uncompromisingly demolished.

Being a tentative and would-be playwright, Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's announcement caught my eye with a certain force.

I entirely agree that it would be interesting to know on what terms the firm transacts business with aspiring authors; also whether Mr. Archer's advice or help has or has not been instrumental in causing the acceptance, or refusal, of any one particular play. My own experience is not large, but, such as it is, it extends to both books and plays—both of which I live in hopes of bringing to the notice of an admiring (it is well to be optimistic) public in the fulness of time. Among other things I have gathered that literary agents are a most excellent means of "buying" further experience—so far as unknown authors are concerned.

Any other use has escaped my (doubtless short-sighted) notice.

If you could instruct me I should be grateful and obliged, for no one requires real help more than a would-be author. But, leaving all this on one side from considerations of space, an idea occurs to me, which declines expulsion from my mind, that Mr. Archer's gifts must be of a very unusual kind.

It appears to be generally admitted that successful playwrights realise quite acceptable sums of money—more than one or two guineas at a time. If a man is so skilled in what material a play should contain that in a few hundred drastic and nicely-chosen words he is enabled to convert a bad play into a good one, or a non-acceptable play into an acceptable one, then that man is a remarkable man. This, I think, may be assumed without dispute.

The man I am referring to must possess a unique gift of criticism and an intimate knowledge of both construction and dialogue (not to mention "story"), which would appear to me to be the perfect and ideal equipment of a successful dramatist.

No doubt I am wrong, but, assuming I am correct, does Mr. Archer advise on plays from philanthropy?

He would make such a lot of money if he wrote plays himself.

I, for one, should be envious of his fame, and indulge Socialistic ideas when I contemplated his wealth.

In other walks of life a competent instructor is usually a craftsman himself.

It would be easy for any wielder of the mighty pen to confute me with the differences in the genius of a "producer" and a "critic," but I venture to suggest that such a course would not be germane to the position Mr. Archer takes up with regard to this question, and to the art of the playwright generally.

I have written a "play" (?) and a friend of mine (a well-known author and playwright himself) has been kind enough not only to read it, but to send it with his recommendation to a very big man in the theatrical world.

When I get it back (I am not really an optimist) shall I, sir, send it to Mr. Archer from curiosity, and will you pay the fee for me?

I don't think it's worth it myself.

"GREENJACKET."

A FITTING REMEDY FOR "SUFFRAGETTE" MANIA.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It becomes clearer every day that there is much truth in Dr. Shipley's recent finding, to the effect that the present Suffragette wave of madness partakes of the form of "a peculiar mental disorder," known in the Middle Ages as "tarantism." For "nervous malady" it is, must be, which drives even apparently cultivated women, or women, at least, of pre-established social standing and cultured surroundings, in many instances to such utterly absurd and ridiculous resorts as the leaders of the extreme Suffragette element persistently involve themselves and their "Cause." But, surely, the patience of the British public must, by this time, have become pretty well exhausted; for there is a limit, even to the endurance of the most patient of rational beings, and nausea is the inevitable ultimate to a too-prolonged sensational series of stage-plays.

And, really, it is difficult to conceive of a situation at once so ludicrous, incongruous, and abnormally afflictive as the present Suffragette craze has developed; or one else in which so much mental disorder is commingled with perversity, persistence, and disgraceful antics. "Cold water" might be, and no doubt would be a capital antidote; but—who is to apply it? For, like the proverbial "mad dog," your modern "Suffragette" will clearly avoid that—cannot abide it!

But there, seeing that these mad creatures are yet treated as sane, and are held, accordingly, as "liable" to the penalties of the law, why not make the penalty of such termagants "fit" the "crime," and punish them accordingly? But, perhaps, it would be equally effective, as a "restraining" method, to treat these "neurotic" afflicted ones as clearly "demented" and "irresponsible" victims, and to send the most, or worst and most violent offenders to penal asylums—and "treat" them accordingly. There, they might with some hope (by means of diet, cold-water plunges, and discipline) be ultimately "cured" of their grievous malady. For I gravely suspect that the most obstreperous and violent of the "leaders," at all events, are, pretty generally, the "victims" of their own self-inflicted woes and grievances—because they "live too high," and have not enough to do. Were it otherwise, it is next to impossible that women of the rank of not a few of these "leaders" would so far bemean themselves and outrage common decency. In any event, it is perfectly plain that they, and such as they, are not in the least "qualified," either by brains or "education," and far less by their "womanhood," rationally to exercise the coveted franchise, even were they successful in obtaining it.

In brief, to "enfranchise" the "Suffragettes" of to-day would be little short of madness on the part of the electorate of Great Britain, and not until the present wave of "tarantism" has spent itself, and until the British "woman," in the aggregate approves herself more worthy of the franchise, should she be allowed a ghost of a chance to add to the sum of the common madness and confusion of the national councils. For if ever there was a time, or epoch, in British history in which national sanity, in the fullest sense, was an essential requisite, that time, and that juncture, is the present one. And surely John Bull must by this time have had his "fill" of diversion and "tarantism." And, now, it is high time that he assayed a little reflection, and resumed "business!"

By HOPE PROTHEROE, Author of "One Man's Sin."

An up-to-date novel, in style and method of subject treatment, and a decided advance on "ONE MAN'S SIN." Those who, as a result of reading that book, expect only pathos from this author, will, in "THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE," be agreeably disappointed. A rough diamond and a rose would be strange mates indeed; yet no whit more so than the couple of human beings whose story is here presented. How a man may struggle in vain against a force stronger than himself, and a woman become a daily terror to the man who loves her, are graphically portrayed. The sympathy of most will be extended to the man, who, in the depth of his own despair, takes the blame of his wife's action upon himself, and deals forcibly, yet withal in gentlemanly fashion, with his worse than—interfering mother-in-law. The last chapter leaves the reader with a distinct note of hopefulness and the prospect of the hero's final reclamation, and that as the hands of a woman who has, herself, a "conscientious scruple" that will inevitably affect her future life. It is a book that everyone should read and recommend. It is at times comic, dramatic and sensational, and the interest it inspires is fully sustained to the end.

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.

A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story offers the kind of fare which will appeal to most readers of fiction. Miss Effie Chamberlayne, the author of "A SHOOTING STAR," comes from a political family; but in addition to her knowledge of affairs, she shows that she possesses, in an uncommon degree, the qualities of imagination and humour that go to make up the successful novelist. The story itself, which is laid mainly in England, is concerned with the possession of some politically "compromising documents"; and the mystery surrounding both the recovery of the papers, and the personality of the Agent attempting the task, is manipulated with a dexterity and a resource not often to be met with in a first effort. "A SHOOTING STAR" leads up by stages to an exciting and dramatic climax, in which, however, the probabilities are kept well within bounds. Miss Effie Chamberlayne has written a story in which there is a due admixture of light and shade, of grave and gay; and the ranks of wholesome, natural, and straightforward action have received a recruit whose work should be heartily welcomed.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET
and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

sgd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations, 7/6 net.

This is the first book which has been published on the bloodless but far-reaching Revolution in Turkey, an event worthy of a place beside the great liberating movements of Greece and Italy, and destined to change profoundly the issues of the Near Eastern question. It contains information which can only be learnt from the lips of the actual authors of the movement. These Mr. Buxton has had a unique opportunity of knowing personally, having accompanied his brother, Mr. Noel Buxton, the chairman of the Balkan Committee, in the recent deputation to Constantinople. He describes the leading Young Turks, the Sultan, the Grand Vizier, the Sheikh-ul-Islam, and the growth, success, prospects and dangers of the new movement.

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"... He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible writer. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chaloner believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chaloner goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horsehoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

'A second sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gun-bedizen'd "horse-hoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly bags and matrons fair!
His votareesses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chaloner steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spangl'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!

But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a four de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chaloner to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

LIFE AND LETTERS

By the death of Mr. Algernon Charles Swinburne we lose the last of our great poets, or, as Mr. George Meredith very properly puts it, "the greatest of our lyrical poets." Not only so, but we lose a critic of fine and fierce parts, a man of a high heart and a noble view of letters and the literary function. No poet has worn the purple of his office with greater dignity and reasonableness than Mr. Swinburne. He let them rave and kept with the Muses. Notoriety and what is called legitimate advertisement never appealed to him. He had the great man's subconscious scorn of littleness, pettiness and vulgarity. It mattered nothing to him who praised him or who blamed him, and though he was a swashbuckler in his way, nowhere do you find him fighting for Swinburne. It is befitting that a poet who carried his greatness with such extraordinary and child-like modesty should somehow have contrived to save us the usual squabble about Westminster Abbey. In a sense Westminster Abbey would have been his natural and proper place of sepulchre. But he was buried on Thursday in the Isle of Wight; so that we were spared a considerable deal of illustrated journalism as well. It is curious that Tennyson should come out of the Isle of Wight to Westminster Abbey, and that Swinburne should come out of London to the Isle of Wight. It is singular, also, that the announcements of his death were, without exception, tailed off with the inevitable intelligence that the death of Mr. Swinburne "came as a terrible shock to his life-long friend, Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton." We have still to read Mr. Clement Shorter on the subject.

After grave deliberation Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie send us the following letter:

5 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden,
London, W.C.
April 8th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY,
63 Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

SIR,—In your edition of April 3rd appears the following editorial comment:

If the most hopeless playwright in the world sent Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie the most hopeless play that was ever written, together with a cheque for fifty guineas and a request that the play be submitted to every manager in London, Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie would not send back the cheque, and there would be no dishonour or discredit about the transaction.

This is seriously untrue. We undertake arrangements for only such work as we can, with a reasonable amount of confidence, commend to publishers or dramatic managers, and never, so far, have found it advisable to accept a retaining fee, either from dramatic or literary authors. At present we see no reason to alter this policy, and if a "most hopeless play," or, indeed, any play or book not considered worthy of a manager's or publisher's immediate attention, were sent to us, together with a cheque for fifty guineas—or for ten times that amount—both cheque and play would be returned at once. Furthermore, we should consider it decidedly discreditable to do otherwise, for the money would be taken under false pretences. We cannot place an undesirable work as well as the author himself can. Such London managers as we have dealt with are apparently genuinely glad to get plays from us, realising that only such plays are offered as seem to careful readers to be really worthy of consideration. In consequence, not only do plays offered by us get immediate attention, but we have a number of applications from responsible managers for plays to suit their requirements. In the last four weeks, four plays—all either three or four acts—offered by us in the last six weeks have been accepted for either London or New York production; the advance payments to the authors have been made on three of them; and the advance payment on the fourth is due in two weeks. Our work is paid for only by commission on sums actually collected for the author.

These statements are so precisely contrary to your editorial observations that we trust you will think it fair to withdraw both your hypothesis, so far as its application to our firm is concerned, and the comment you have built upon it.

Yours very truly,

CURTIS BROWN AND MASSIE.

We rejoice to hear that Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie do not accept fees—whatever Mr. Archer may do; though, on the other hand, we are sorry that they are anxious to insist upon a wrong view of the Dramatic Agent's business. They say that they would not accept a cheque for submitting a hopeless play to actors and managers; and they also say that if they accepted such a cheque they would be obtaining money by false pretences. We have always understood that it was the business of a literary or dramatic agent to take the instruction and fees of any client who happens to turn up. But Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie are of a different opinion, and it seems that they never take fees and that they would not handle a hopeless play at any price whatever. Two questions naturally arise out of these admirable circumstances: Are we to understand that Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie live out of a percentage on "sums actually collected for the author"; and, secondly, if they do live on this percentage, is it not a little singular that we should find them inserting in a journal like the Author an advertisement which is obviously addressed to amateurs? We have no desire in the world to traverse Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's statements, and still less do we desire to impute to them discreditable or improper methods of business. At the same time, it seems to us difficult to reconcile the letter we now print with the advertisement which they were lately publishing from month to month in the official journal of the Authors' Society. Are we to understand also that Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie take no share of the fees charged by Mr. Archer for reading, advising, doctoring, tinkering-up and otherwise making presentable the unpresentable and the unacceptable and the hopeless?

We note further and with satisfaction that Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie have quite lately placed "in London or New York" four plays for their clients, and that in three instances the payment in advance has been received. Of course, if Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie are desirous of introducing America into the question, we are afraid that we shall be unable to cope with them. America is a vast continent, and we are happy to think that we are more or less unacquainted with the literary and dramatic agency business as it is conducted in America. But it seems to us that, having skilfully and no doubt profitably disposed of four plays "in London or New York," Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie might, without any very extraordinary mental effort, have contrived to be a little more definite on the point. That is to say, it would be easy for them to inform us how many of these four plays have been disposed of in England, which, when all is said and done, is the important country. It would also have been interesting to hear what sums are being paid in advance, and it would have been more interesting still to know if any of these plays have been doctored by Mr. Archer, and if any of them is the work of the kind of amateur to whom Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's late advertisement was addressed. Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie are anxious that we should "withdraw." THE ACADEMY is not in the habit of withdrawing, particularly where there is nothing to withdraw. Our point is not that Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie are conducting a discreditable or dubious business, and we should not consider that they were conducting a dubious or discreditable business even if they were accepting fees and dealing with hopeless amateurs.

What we maintain is that the advertisement which, jointly with Mr. Archer, they have caused to be inserted in the Author is an advertisement which might readily be misinterpreted by amateur authors, and which is, consequently, an undesirable advertisement from the point of view of authorship. Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie assure us in their letter that they will not handle hopeless work. Is it not a pity that they omitted to mention this fact in their advertisement in the Author? There is not a single word in this advertisement which will lead amateurs of any sort or kind to a knowledge of the great truth that when Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie receive a hopeless play they return the manuscript and the fees. On the contrary, the advertisement is capable of being read as a direct invitation to persons who have failed hopelessly, to have another try and to employ Mr. Archer as a sort of guide, philosopher and friend, at two guineas a time, to render their bad plays good enough for the handling of Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie. We have great pleasure in giving Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's letter the publicity which we gave to their advertisement and to Mr. Archer's letter. We do not intend anything that we have said to be taken as a reflection on Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie's good faith or good intentions towards their clients. But we reiterate that their advertisement was an advertisement which might induce misconception in the mind of the inexperienced, and we are glad to see that they have had the good sense to withdraw it. We think that if the words "Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie do not accept fees and cannot in any circumstance submit to managers or actors work which does not possess sufficient merit to render acceptance possible," the advertisement would be an entirely proper one so far as Messrs. Curtis Brown and Massie are concerned. Whether even with this addition it would tend to lend lustre to the name of Mr. William Archer is another question.

We are flattered to observe in the Spectator for April 10th an article entitled "In the Time of the Lilies." The article commences as follows:

One of the commonest flowers in any herbaceous border is the beautiful, old-fashioned Madonna lily. There are many statelier and more gorgeous blossoms of the lily kind, but none sweeter, and then, too, the "Mary Lily," as it is called in the North of England, has the added charm of association, for no picture of the Annunciation is complete unless a branch of these pure white blossoms stands up between Mary and the angel.

By a singular coincidence there appeared in THE ACADEMY of February 13th an article entitled "In the Time of the Lilies," and this article also began: "One of the commonest flowers in any herbaceous border is the beautiful old-fashioned Madonna lily, etc., etc." Not to put too fine a point on it, the Spectator of April 10th has reprinted holus-bolus and without a word of acknowledgment an article which appeared in THE ACADEMY of February 13th. We are aware that the editor of the Spectator, Mr. St. Loe Strachey, affects not to read THE ACADEMY. The fact that when he fails to read THE ACADEMY he is not doing his best by the Spectator and the readers of the Spectator need not concern us. We, for our part, read the Spectator and the Saturday Review and the Athenaeum and even the Outlook. If Mr. St. Loe Strachey would devote a little of the time which he consecrates to the preparation of extraordinary speeches about the Press to a perusal of his contemporaries and co-partners in the literary field, he would at least save himself such pathetic and unjournalistic accidents as the one to which we hereby call attention. Furthermore, he would find it an excellent tonic for his high and mighty—if a trifle jumpy—mind.

Of course, it is open for Mr. St. Loe Strachey, who is nothing if not our only authority on the higher journalism, to retort after the manner of Mr. C. Arthur Pearson's editor that it is not the function of an editor to read his contemporaries; and that an editor is not responsible for the slips and blunders of the mewling and puking underlings who do the real work of newspaper editing. The editor of the Spectator, unlike Mr. C. Arthur Pearson's editor, is so busy lurching with the German Minister and arranging the terms of the Budget proposals with Mr. Lloyd George that he cannot possibly be expected to have the smallest interest in what the editor of THE ACADEMY or the editor of the Saturday Review may happen to be saying. On the other hand, Mr. St. Loe Strachey, again unlike Mr. C. Arthur Pearson's editor, would appear to maintain for his own private behoof a more or less efficient editorial intelligence department. That is to say, he appears to have told off some subordinate or other to read THE ACADEMY for him, and to report to him promptly any slip that THE ACADEMY might make when the Spectator is under discussion. It is this admirable service, no doubt, which enabled him to assure us so pompously the other day that he had been "informed" that such and such an issue of THE ACADEMY contained such and such a misstatement with regard to the Spectator. We trust that the aforesaid intelligence department will make haste to inform their inflated chief—we hope chief is a good enough term—about this terrible affair as to the lilies. We are all acquainted with the beautiful old-fashioned Madonna lily, but the beautiful old-fashioned abdominal editor in a cocked hat amuses us.

The vagaries of the cheaper press continue to stagger one. The Daily Mirror, for example, has reduced its readers to such a state of brainlessness that it is now compelled to provide them with a daily table of subjects for conversation at dinner. We append an example:

TO-DAY'S DINNER-TABLE TOPICS.

POLITICAL AND SOCIAL.

April weddings. The marriage of Lord Dalmeny, Lord Rosebery's eldest son, and Miss Dorothy Grosvenor to-day.

Which is the best month to get married in? Is May unlucky? Have you any superstitions about marriage? Do you prefer quiet or noisy weddings? The disadvantage of being married "quietly" is that you are apt to miss all the presents—the silver inkstands, the silver toast-racks, the complete editions of Tennyson's works; and perhaps also the diamond necklaces, the cheques, and the household furniture. If you do not ask everybody to the wedding, everybody is not obliged to give you a present.

In politics to-day there is the Independent Labour Party crisis and the question of Socialism, or different views of it, involved.

Abroad, the crisis at Constantinople. The eternal problem and danger of the Near East.

GENERAL, LITERARY, THEATRICAL.

It is said that Bank Holiday crowds this Easter have been better behaved and given less trouble than ever before. Can it be that the loud-voiced Bank Holiday bouncer, who leaves scraps of paper and broken bottles about, is at last dying out? Did you see anything of him last Monday? And so on and so forth.

Surely idiocy is getting the upper hand amongst us. Meanwhile the New Age finds it necessary to print articles about "mental fitness" (we thought it would come to that) and Mr. T. P. O'Connor's bright educational organ, T. P.'s Weekly, is running a series of articles on "Mental Tillage." The articles, need one say, are by a Mr. MacPhairson. We suppose that mental tillage has something to do with putting manure in one's boots.

In the current number of Vanity Fair Mr. Frank Harris calls attention to what, in the absence of explanation, looks like an exceedingly flagrant case of plagiarism. It seems that Mr. Harris has been reading a novel by Mr. Jack London, and that this novel contains an entire article by Mr. Harris, which Mr. London has "lifted" and appropriated without so much as "By your leave." What is more, the article in question happens to embody a very striking and in a way sensational idea, and Mr. London is no doubt getting considerable kudos out of it. There is a story about a gentleman who, on being caught in most compromising circumstances by another gentleman with murder in his eye, exclaimed, "My dear sir, don't shoot, everything can be explained." We are inclined to think that in this instance Mr. Jack London will want all his wits to account creditably for what has taken place. The present paragraph must not be taken as an indication that we approve particularly of either Mr. Harris or Vanity Fair. But there is no reason why either of them should be robbed in the daylight.

BONCHURCH, APRIL 15, 1909

THE cherry whitens in the April air,
Young Spring has spilt her magic on the wold,
The woodlands ring with rapture as of old,
And England lies new-washen, green and fair;
Yet is she heavy with a secret care,
For Death the ever-sharp and ever-bold Hath taken our Tongue of Honey, our Throat of Gold;
And we have digged a pit, and left him there.

So must he sleep, though it be high broad noon
Or Venus shimmer in the darkling firs:
The music and the roses are forgot;
Even the great round marigold of a moon,
That is for lovers and for harvesters,
And all the sighing seas, may move him not.

ALGERNON CHARLES SWIN- BURNE

"VICISTI GALILÆE!" That was the quotation, one supposes, which came most frequently to men's lips when they heard that Swinburne was dead. To most of us he had stood for the Hellenic element in a world that has long since abandoned Hellas and her ideals; he was a Victorian in nothing but the external detail of his floruit. In a sense, of course, his defeat came long before his death. With the great body of Victorian poetry he had little in common, and he had even less in common with the world of everyday thought. When Swinburne began to write, the "pale Galilæan" had already won the day: it was the Tennysons and the Brownings whose message came straight to men's hearts. For the Hellenic passion of self-abandonment there was no place.

For, after all, it was this self-abandonment and this passion that formed the side of Hellenism which Swinburne chiefly loved and of which he was the chief singer. To "see life steadily and see it whole" formed no part of his gospel, and the "sweetness and light" of Sophocles were as far removed from his vision as the abnegations of St. Paul. He was, if you will, a Greek of the Greeks, but he was a Greek of the Ionian period: his poetry is akin, not to Sophocles and Æschylus, not even to Pindar, but to Sappho, Alcæus, and, in a later day, to the poets of the Anthology and to Theocritus. One can find in him little of that restraint, that clarity of outline, and fineness of atmosphere that characterised Greek work of the Periclean period. You seek in vain anything like the "Cædipus Tyrannus" and the "Antigone"—or even like the "Medea" and the "Hippolytus." That impersonal outlook which most of us think of as peculiarly Greek was wholly alien from his temperament. He was Greek, in fact, in virtue of two qualities: his love of beauty and his love of freedom. Two qualities, it is true, of high importance, but by no means the whole of Hellenism. His work, indeed, in many ways comes nearer to the Renaissance than to Hellas: it has all the passionate enthusiasm, the absence of restraint that characterised the work of the Italians. It is a poetry whose whole object is the worship of beauty, and a poetry which finds that beauty more in "human things" than in the world of Nature. It is a poetry of some virtues and of many faults; but, setting aside the question of its own worthiness, it is a poetry which could not make any strong appeal to the public of yesterday and to-day. Two causes, one may say, predestined it to value. It came at a time when Christian ethics, as opposed to Christian theory, were at their strongest. Some day, possibly, men may return to the Hellenic standpoint, or it may be the Gothic spirit will come to its own. In either case Mr. Swinburne's poetry might well make a far wider appeal. But for the nonce, happily, we are under the influence of St. Paul: the "world and the flesh" are classed with "the devil." In us—that is, in our flesh—"dwelleth no good thing." And the one thing essential to Mr. Swinburne's art is a profound—nay, a devout—belief, not in the human soul, but in the human body. The "Poems and Ballads" had no message of beauty in man's heart, no vision of the glory of self-sacrifice and devotion, of friendship and comradeship—nothing but this intense and passionate pursuit of sensuous beauty. The chorus of disapprobation which it met proved definitely that this side of Hellenism—and perhaps, after all, it is the most prominent side—could, in the nature of things, find no place in modern life. "Wilt thou yet take all," he sings:

Wilt thou yet take all, Galilean; but these thou shalt not take,
The laurel, the palms, and the pæan; the breasts of the nymphs in the brake.

But the cry is a cry of despair: of one who finds none to answer him. Men would have none of these "secret ways of love" of his, any more than they would endure his devotion to externals in beauty. He made his appeal to a few—to those Hellenists who set this side of their divinity over all others; above all, to those who, knowing little of Greece, were prepared to take their Paganism at second-hand. To the most part of men he was "a voice crying in the wilderness," and his words, they said, were not good to listen to. The glory and rapture of the world's youth could not be brought back by mere desire: for good or ill men had flung away that self-abandonment; and Swinburne was speaking to hearers whose lips had "grown sad with kissing Christ."

And it well may be that another cause, as potent if more subtle, was working against this revival of Hellenism. His poetry, great as it often is, has nearly always an element of unreality. He lived, if you like, in an unreal world, a place of "lovely shadows and beautiful dreams." He had taken beauty as his province, and he had no more than other men's conceptions of the beautiful. He deals, in fact, with the avowedly poetic subjects: Life, Love, Death—the trinity of every minor poet and most great ones. He fails, as many poets failed—as Keats and Rossetti failed—to see the beautiful in everyday things. That power of seeking out new hiding-places of Romance—which Wordsworth and Browning had, which Whitman had, which to-day is the possession of none save Mr. Kipling—that power Mr. Swinburne had not. In the unsubstantial dreamworld of the poets he could find eternal beauty—he could not see that "Beauty is Truth, Truth Beauty, that is all." And so one feels that, even in a world predisposed to the pursuit of the purely beautiful, even in a world which had not taken St. Paul as its preceptor, Mr. Swinburne's poetry, with an admittedly wider appeal, would yet have been transient in its influence. Its pursuit of Beauty was unacceptable, through the influence of a creed; it could never have been successful because it proceeded on unsound principles.

He was fighting, then, in a cause pre-doomed to failure; and his poetry bears many of the traces of such work. There is a disposition to exaggerate his theory, which in many cases brought Mr. Swinburne very close to other writers. The gap which separates "Faustine" and "Dorian Gray" is no very large one, and, allowing for difference of temperament, "Anactoria" and "Dolores" might well have come from Théophile Gautier. The pursuit of human beauty which is healthy in Sappho and in a great part of the Anthology has become morbid in "Poems and Ballads." Setting aside "Atalanta in Calydon"—and that is an early work—Mr. Swinburne's gospel is a gospel of unnatural warmth, of unnatural lights and shades. It is the difference between clear dawn and a lurid sunset. He would follow beauty "like a sinking star"—beyond the utmost bounds of human thought or of normal emotion: through "secrets and sorrows unbeheld of us." He would "follow beauty," but it is:

That thing transform'd which was the Cytherean,
With lips that lost their Grecian laugh divine Long since.

This new Hellenism has little in common with "the first fine careless rapture" which produced Sappho: it is more akin to the Renaissance, but it is a renaissance fallen on evil days. For the clear skies and bright light of the Italians and of the Elizabethan Romantics it gives us the "fervid, languid glories" of heavier suns in mightier skies—"dreams, desires and sombre songs and sweet." It is a poetry which could not live nowadays. "Noble and nude and antique" it may be, but one knows certainly that its father is not "a god and a Greek." Mr. Swinburne is following, not Cytherea nor Persephare, nor Apollo, but "a ghost, a bitter and luxurious god."

With it all there is, and especially in the later work, a definite consciousness of failure and a resultant pessimism. Be it Christian ethics that have wrought the mischief or no, the fact remains clear that this pursuit of beauty is a "creed outworn." "Itylus" shows that as plainly as does "Dolores," or that "Ave atque Vale" which is possibly Mr. Swinburne's greatest work. "Rose or rue or laurel," these are the gifts Mr. Swinburne brought to Baudelaire, and they are the flowers ourselves must strew to-day. "Thelème is afar as the water" and no man may come to it. The world, perhaps, was not worthy, not sure enough for this ancient creed; at any rate, the fact of failure stands out clear, clear even to the poet himself. "Atalanta in Calydon"—the one piece of work which came nearest to the Greek—is the one piece of work which makes an appeal to the modern soul. That apart, all is bitterness, bitterness of defeat and hope unfulfilled:

The years are hungry,
They wail all their days;
The gods wax angry,
And weary of praise,

And who shall bridle their lips, and who shall straighten their ways.

The Master "that was thrall to Love" is "become thrall to Death."

And, with it all, Mr. Swinburne yet gave us much that was great poetry. His revolt against the Victorians was not wholly in vain. He produced "Atalanta in Calydon," and he produced "Hertlia." It was well, in an age when men had forgotten Greece, that Greece should call to them, even though they could not listen to her voice, even though the message was no true one. It was well that, for this last time, men should know something of a creed they had rejected, even though that creed came to them in a false setting. It was well Mr. Swinburne wrote, if only that his devotion to beauty produced felicities of phrase and of music, whose like no other poet—not even Shelley—has given us. The old order had passed and, in this age at least, might not return; but it had left an imperishable heritage. And, for Mr. Swinburne himself, one likes to think of him as one sent “out of due season” with a message the world would not hear—because it must not. The “Song of the Sirens” was lovely, though it brought destruction. His task was impossible, and his path a thorny one, so one likes to think of him now as apart from praise or recrimination, where “beyond these voices there is peace.” It is the tribute himself paid to another of his own camp:

Content thee, howsoe'er, whose days are done;
There lies not any troublous thing before,
Nor sight nor sound to war against thee more,
For whom all winds are quiet as the sun,
All waters as the shore.

Evil days and evil tongues, “nothing can touch him further.” Requiescat.

SWINBURNE'S PROSE

THE lamentable and totally unexpected death of almost the last of England's great poets has moved us with a sorrow, the depth of which, perhaps, we had hardly anticipated. Mr. Swinburne was so familiar a figure that it was possible to forget that in him we still possessed a man whose words burned in the ears of the prophets of nearly half a century ago. It may not be unprofitable at this time when the echoes of his verse ring through the bereaved land to glance at another side of his work—the prose writings.

Compared with the company of those to whom his name is familiar through his poems, the number of persons acquainted with his prose productions is disproportionate; and this is not difficult to understand, since with the exception of a single novel published in 1905 (“Love's Cross-Currents”), the prose lies in the somewhat recondite domain of literary criticism.

The reply of Dr. Samuel Johnson to Boswell when the subject of literary taste was being argued is peculiarly pertinent to our present theme. “One loves a neat style,” said the Doctor, “another loves a style of more splendour. In like manner, one loves a plain coat, another loves a laced coat, but neither will deny that each is good in its kind.” There can be no law of the Medes and Persians as to this mysterious quality of style in literature. Swift, Addison, Steele; Scott, Dickens, Thackeray; Ruskin, Morris, Stevenson—all possessed it, yet how diverse the moulds into which it ran, even when the ideas treated chanced to be alike! The wonder of language is inexhaustible, but so common that rarely do we give it a thought. By a certain series of tiny marks upon paper our wishes, our opinions, our love, hate, sorrow, fear, can be conveyed to millions of other human beings; and by the manner in which a man arranges and uses these twenty-six impish little shapes he may rise to be among the greatest in the land—may himself be loved, hated, or feared by people he has never seen or known. “Certainly the Art of Writing is the most miraculous of all things man has devised,” says Carlyle. A great book is imperishable, whereas “mighty fleets and armies, harbours and arsenals, vast cities, high-domed, many-engined—they are precious; but what do they become?” To explain this property of greatness, however, the attribute of style must be accepted, and by that one word we judge the outpourings of all men in all ages, from the most malevolent invective, the most pompous rhetoric, to the simplest effects of pure description.

Most modern authors show traces of some particularly admired predecessor in their writings, or acknowledge their indebtedness to him as does a pupil to his famous master. Precisely as Mr. Henry James frankly admits his literary debt to Honoré de Balzac, so Mr. Swinburne sat at the feet of Gamaliel in the person of Victor Hugo—“the spiritual sovereign of the nineteenth century,” as he termed his idol. In his remarkable book “A Study of Victor Hugo”—remarkable for a fervour and a fluency which has seldom been equalled, we imagine, by any English author, we have a declaration of his faith, and, be it added with all due respect and admiration for the marvellous flood of brilliant phrases and reverberant polysyllables, an extravagance of laudation which seems in danger of defeating its own ends. A sentence at the opening of the volume sets the note:—

For us, who from childhood upwards have fostered and fortified whatever of good was born in us—all capacity of spiritual work, all seed of human sympathy, all powers of hope and faith, all passions and aspirations found loyal to the service of duty and of love—with the bread of his deathless word and the wine of his immortal song, the one thing possible to do in this first hour of bitterness and stupefaction at the sense of a loss not possible yet to realise is not to declaim his praise or parade our lamentation in modulated effects or efforts of panegyric or of dirge: it is to reckon up once more the standing account of our all but incalculable debt.

It is no small strain to write to that standard all through the book, and it is no small strain to the reader to follow it. The very fertility, persistence, and facility of the eulogy seem to make for weakness; it is debatable whether this tribute of a great poet to a greater would not have gained in critical value and in power by the adoption of a less continuous and exhausting profusion of praise. Quotations are numerous from the French poet, but the reader is taken by the shoulders, as it were, to confront them with his ears ringing out the resonance of preceding English paragraphs; he is credited with meagre faculties of appreciation of his own. We chanced upon a copy of this volume a few weeks ago wherein the following passage was underscored:—

In the sixth book I can but rapidly remark the peculiar beauty and greatness of the lyric lines in which the sound of steady seas regularly breaking on the rocks at Rozel Tower is rendered with so solemn and severe an echo of majestic strength in sadness; the verses addressed to the people on its likeness and unlikeness to the sea; the scornful and fiery appeal to the spirit of Juvenal; the perfect idyllic picture of spring, with all the fruitless exultation of its blossoms and its birds, made suddenly dark and dissonant by recollection of human crime and shame; the heavenly hopefulness of comfort in the message of the morning star, conveyed into colours of speech and translated into cadences of sound which no painter or musician could achieve.

The pencilled comment of some rebellious reader upon this, in the margin, was “Euphuism run riot!” A student might perhaps be pardoned, however truly he esteemed the sincerity of the paragraph, for feeling slightly nettled at its flamboyance and alliteration—it is full steam ahead and rush all the signals, without doubt. Proceeding a little farther into the volume we have other instances of this style, which, to employ Dr. Johnson's metaphor, is a very “laced coat” indeed:—

The first poem of the seventh book, on the falling of the walls of Jericho before the seventh trumpet-blast, is equally great in description and in application; the third is one of the great lyric masterpieces of all time, the triumphant ballad of the Black Huntsman, unsurpassed in the world for ardour of music and fitful change of note from mystery and terror to rage and tempest and supreme serenity of exultation. "Wind and storm fulfilling his word," we may literally say of this omnipotent sovereign of song. . . . The song on the two Napoleons is a masterpiece of skilful simplicity in contrast of tones and colours. But the song which follows, written to a tune of Beethoven's, has in it something more than the whole soul of music, the whole passion of self-devoted hope and self-transfiguring faith; it gives the final word of union between sound and spirit, the mutual coronation and consummation of them both. And then comes a poem so great that I hardly dare venture to attempt a word in its praise. We cannot choose but think, as we read or repeat it, that "such music was never made" since the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. . . . It is simply impossible that a human tongue should utter, a human hand should write, anything of more supreme and transcendent beauty than the last ten stanzas of the fourth division of this poem. The passionate and fervent accumulation of sublimities, of marvellous images and of infinite appeal, leaves the sense too dazzled, the soul too entranced and exalted, to appreciate at first or in full the miraculous beauty of the language, the superhuman sweetness of the song.

The whole volume is a pageant of applausive adjectives and intensifying adjectival phrases—"utterly incomparable," "ineffable," "most divine," "most absolutely and adorably beautiful book ever written," "nothing has ever been conceived more perfect"—such are a few of the banner-bearers in the procession.

Let it be clearly understood that we are not questioning the worthiness of that great and kingly poet, Victor Hugo; we merely state what we believe to be true—that the value of his disciple's homage would have been enhanced and equilibrated had he not released such an Euroclydon of acclamation.

On whatever subject he wrote, Mr. Swinburne's prose was astounding: it leaves the reader breathless; it ransacks the mother-tongue, ascends the heights, searches the deeps, and leaves the middle levels for milder men. To illustrate its power when the author has found a foe worthy of his steel, we may take a passage or two from his judgment of Walt Whitman—whose irregular and harsh versification and casual rhyming would be, we can well believe, as gall and wormwood to so masterly a melodist. This article appears in the "Studies in Prose and Poetry," and is entitled "Whitmania." We quote its opening sentence:

The remarkable American rhapsodist who has inoculated a certain number of English readers and writers with the singular form of ethical and æsthetic rabies for which his name supplies the proper medical term of definition is usually regarded by other than Whitmaniacs as simply a blatant quack—a vehement and emphatic dunce, of incomparable vanity and volubility, inconceivable pretension and incompetence.

He proceeds to explain that such is by no means his own view; but if ever a man was "damned with faint praise," Whitman was by Mr. Swinburne—witness the summing-up of the whole matter:

His sympathies, I repeat, are usually generous, his views of life are occasionally just, and his views of death are invariably noble. In other words, he generally means well, having a good stock on hand of honest emotion; he sometimes sees well, having a natural sensibility to such aspects of nature as appeal to an eye rather quick than penetrating; he seldom writes well, being cabined, cribbed, confined, bound in, to the limits of a thoroughly unnatural, imitative, histrionic and affected style. But there is a thrilling and fiery force in his finest bursts of gusty rhetoric which makes us wonder whether with a little more sense and a good deal more cultivation he might not have made a noticeable orator.

There is a leonine wrath about this verdict; one imagines a lion might play in similar manner with his victim before dispatching him.

In his wildest exuberance of prose, it must be noted that Mr. Swinburne's language was never dishevelled; it was an orderly intoxication, a progress tempestuous and at times almost riotous, but never breaking from the trammels of correctness. If the chains of flowery decoration are occasionally wound so tightly round the meaning that they become thongs and manacles where-by freedom of transmission of the idea is endangered it is permissible to think that they had better have been used more sparingly or more judiciously. The suspension and the prolonged adverbial and adjectival phrase are characteristic of Mr. Swinburne's prose—there is a sentence containing nearly three hundred words in the dedicatory epistle of the last edition of his "Poems"—and it was congruous with this desire for elaboration that he should select ornate symbols rather than simple ones to utter his thought. Often he succeeded perfectly; sometimes he failed. What is an ordinary reader to gather from such a phrase as "the unspoken expression of hopeless and inexpressible regret"?—which occurs in the "Studies" from which we have just been quoting. He is bound to retreat, vanquished, though with an inkling of the thought that burned behind the baffling screen of words.

The estimate of the fiction of Wilkie Collins in the same volume is acute and convincing. The paper dealing with Robert Herrick seems to have been interrupted in mid-career and never finished—it concludes with disappointing abruptness just as the reader is anticipating one of those radiant disquisitions which only the author could pen, and which are calculated to exhilarate and satisfy the most querulous or captious critic. The analysis of the art of Beaumont and Fletcher, however, is intimate and full of persuasive suggestion. The remainder of the volume concerns itself chiefly with Victor Hugo, but has also a fine essay in French on "Les Cenci," from which we may take one sentence of interest to lovers of Shelley:

Ôtez a Shelley sa foi sublime, son dévouement héroïque, son amour du droit et de l'idéal, il sera toujours un des plus grands poètes de tous les siècles.

Another excursion into criticism, "A Study of Ben Jonson," demands more than a mere allusion. Mr. Swinburne himself would have been the last person to term it an exhaustive judgment, but when he wrote it down as "a most imperfect and inadequate commentary" he offered us an unnecessary deprecation of his work. For its space, and considering the indefatigable pen of the old-time Laureate, it is probably a more illuminating, vigorous, and original exposition than any other contemporary critic could have brought forward; and if we find it in us to regret the absence of a chapter or a minor division devoted exclusively to such an appreciation of Jonson's few fine lyrics as could only come from Mr. Swinburne, again, we must note that the whole book has a terseness and an equilibrium which render complaints somewhat ungrateful. There is an occasional play of humour, too, in this volume, which comes as a relief to the steady severity of examination and interpretation. In a momentary digression on the work of Rutter, Ben's "dear son, and right learned friend," we hear a note that does not often sound:

His spiritual father or theatrical sponsor is most copious and most cordial in his commendations of the good man's pastoral drama; he has not mentioned its one crowning excellence—the quality for which, having tried it every night for upwards of six weeks running, I can confidently and conscientiously recommend it. Chloral is not only more dangerous but very much less certain as a soporific; the sleeplessness which could resist the influence of Mr. Rutter's verse can be curable only by dissolution; the eyes which can keep open through the perusal of six consecutive pages must never hope to find rest but in the grave.

Modern journalism is arraigned en passant with no stint of energy:

. . . that bird of many notes and many feathers, now so like an eagle and now so like a vulture; now soaring as a falcon or sailing as a pigeon over continents and battlefields, now grovelling and groping as a dunghill kite, with its beak in a very middenstead of falsehood and of filth.

But, as a metaphor, nothing could surpass the comparison in the last sentence of the following passage, in which the author illustrates the curious fact that Jonson's imitators and admirers eclipsed him completely in the lyric quality of their art:

Herrick, as a writer of elegies, epithalamiums, panegyric or complimentary verses, is as plainly and as openly an imitator of his model as ever was the merest parasite of any leading poet, from the days of Chaucer and his satellites to the days of Tennyson and his. No Lydgate or Lytton was ever more obsequious in his discipleship; but for all his loving and loyal protestations of passionate humility and of ardent reverence, we see at every turn, at every step, at every change of note, that what the master could not do the pupil can. When Chapman set sail after Marlowe, he went floundering and lurching in the wake of a vessel that went straight and smooth before the fullest and the fairest wind of song; but when Herrick follows Jonson the manner of movement or the method of progression is reversed.

In the discussion of "Cynthia's Revels," one of Jonson's "magnificent mistakes," we have the real rich and unmistakable vocabulary once more:

There is an exquisite song in it and there are passages—nay, there are scenes—of an excellent prose; but the intolerable elaboration of pretentious dulness and ostentatious ineptitude for which the author claims not merely the tolerance or the condonation which gratitude or charity might accord to the misuse or abuse of genius, but the acclamation due to its exercise and the applause demanded by its triumph—the heavy-headed perversity which ignores all the duties and reclaims all the privileges of a dramatic poet—the Cyclopean ponderosity of perseverance which hammers through scene after scene at the task of ridicule by anatomy of tedious and preposterous futilities—all these too conscientious outrages offered to the very principle of comedy, of poetry, or of drama, make us wonder that we have no record of a retort from the exhausted audience—if haply there were any auditors left—to the dogged defiance of the epilogue:—

By God, 'tis good, and if you like 't you may.
By God, 'tis bad, and worse than tongue can say.

For the most noticeable point in this studiously wayward and laboriously erratic design is that the principle of composition is as conspicuous by its absence as the breath of inspiration; that the artist, the scholar, the disciple, the student of classic models, is as undiscoverable as the spontaneous humourist or poet. The wildest, the roughest, the crudest offspring of literary impulse working blindly on the passionate elements of excitable ignorance was never more formless, more incoherent, more defective in structure, than this voluminous abortion of deliberate intelligence and conscientious culture.

The scheme of our present article would show as out of drawing did we omit to include some mention of Mr. Swinburne's only venture into the field of fiction. "Love's Cross-Currents," as most of our readers will be aware, is written in the form of letters, with a lengthy prologue which elucidates the relationships of the actors in the comedy—for in the main it is a comedy of tangled skeins and lovers in the unkindly grip of fate; at times, however, it borders on the domain of tragedy.

The book seems to have been a production of its author's "literary youth," given to the world at the urgent suggestion of his friend Mr. Watts-Dunton; but it might well pass in some aspects—especially those of style and clarity of thought—as the work of a mature hand. Clarity of plot it can hardly be said to possess until the reader is well into the story and has the various personages with their entanglements fairly assorted in his mind; then the almost laborious concentration which was previously necessary can be slackened, the pleasure of the book begins, and the attention is that of appreciation, not so much that of one who solves a puzzle. One great disadvantage of casting a story in the epistolary mould is that dialogue to a large extent becomes forbidden; there is little relief of smart question and answer, badinage or riposte, and unless some of the letter-writers are endowed by their creator with a strongly humorous outlook on life the romance will run into danger of heaviness—assisted partly by the sheer unbroken appearance of page after page of level, regular print. Nothing approaching so undesirable a doom can be attributed to "Love's Cross-Currents"; for, although there is no exuberant youth or effervescence of frivolity about any of the characters, they each and all weave vividly and distinctly their allotted thread in the pattern. Lady Midhurst, who pulls the strings as well as she can in the endeavour to sort out these troublesome young people, is rather a terrible person; pungent, sarcastic, and pitiless at times, yet with an apologetic air of saying it all for the welfare of the children, grandchildren, and nephews about whose destinies she is so worried that quite takes the sting from her aristocratic fulminations. To one of the impetuous and unduly amorous young men she writes:

I give you a month, my dear boy, to get over your rage at me; then I shall expect you to behave equably. Till that time I suppose I must let you "chew the thrice-turned cud of wrath." Otherwise I should beg you not to make one of the south-coast party I hear of. . . . As it is, I see you will join the rest, and waste your time and wits, besides sinking chin-deep in Platonic sloughs of love. Some day I may succeed in pulling you out. I dare say it ought to be a comfort to me to reflect that you are doing no great harm; dirtier you might get, but scarcely wetter. The quagwater of sentiment will soak you to the bone. . . . Recollect my age, I entreat you. Can you expect sound judgment and accurate relish of the right thing from such an old critic as I am? You might as well hope to make me see her beauty with your eyes as appreciate her goodness in your fashion. And then, bad as I may be, we have been friends too long to break off. If I had ever had a son in my younger years things would have gone differently; as it was, I have always had to put up with you instead. A bad substitute you make, too; but somehow one gets used to that.

To the lady by whose charms this gentleman was stricken she writes announcing the birth of a girl-child to another of the circle:

Get your husband to take a human view of the matter—I suppose his ideas of a baby which is neither zoophyte nor fossil are rather of the vaporous and twilight order of thought—and bring him down for the christianising part of the show, if he will condescend so far. He could take a note or two on the process of animal development by stages, and the decidedly misty origin of that comic species to which our fat present sample of fleshly goods may belong.

To outline the plot would be impertinent to our purpose and quite unnecessary; the title is admirably chosen and sufficiently hints the general tenour of affairs in the story. We should echo the thought, we dare say, of a great many persons to whom Mr. Swinburne's work both in prose and poetry is precious, if we expressed regret that he never saw fit to write, or at any rate to publish, a romance of modern times in the accepted manner—that of mingled narrative and dialogue. Had he been inspired to do this by some impressive and critical situation which might present itself to his mind as worthy of attempted resolution in this form, there would have been no lack of readers on tiptoe of excitement and anticipation, for with his marvellous felicities of diction and apparently inexhaustible arsenals of swift metaphor he might surely have projected a work which would live worthily with any of Mr. Meredith's masterpieces. We can fancy that his hero and heroine would be persons in whose lips speech would be golden and silence silvern. To the novelist we come nearer, somehow, than to the poet; the poet dwells on heights apart, the novelist walks with his fellow-men, becomes to them more of a personality, has less of an abstract existence, knows and is known of them. So much, however, for our dreaming of what might have been.

To endeavour to analyse the poetic art of this "Hero as man of Letters" in a few closing sentences would be as presumptuous as it would be futile. "A human soul who has once got into that primal element of Song, and sung forth fitly somewhat therefrom, has worked in the depths of our existence."

The Poet's is not always a creative art; too often his voice is as the voice of one crying in the wilderness, bringing no definite message, however, no thrill to make the heart throb faster. But here came a new voice, "singing forth fitly," uttering strange and searching music, music of the mysterious sea and the wave-haunted shore, ravishing the ear and captivating all who paused to listen. "The Poet is a heroic figure belonging to all ages; a character which does not pass; whom all ages possess, when once he is produced, whom the newest age as the oldest may produce—and will produce, always when Nature pleases." And such melody as such a poet makes, belongs, we conclude irresistibly, to the singer whose prose we have been discussing; it is not that of sounding brass or tinkling cymbal, but that of sublime harmonies which time will hardly overwhelm. Time is the great and final critic of all things fashioned by human hands and brains; generations come and go; the beating of the pinions of hastening years whirls the chaff into the darkness, and to earth remains the fruitful seed of blooms that are past—seed to germinate and blossom in future ages, for the wonder and welfare of cities yet unbuilt, of humanity yet unborn. Other poets will read, will admire, will imitate in those hidden years; but it is possible that never again from the lips of any one man will flow so rich a volume of music, so splendid a revel of song.

THE "OLD FIRM" IN PUBLISHING

FROM the Book Monthly we cull the following pretty words:

Is a new force, that may cause things to happen, arising in the London publishing world? The close observer puts the question to himself about the Publishers' Circle, which is certainly beginning to make its influence felt in a practical way.

We may say of it that it is the young publishers knocking at the door—yes, at the doors of the literary agent and the author, in particular. In folk-lore and fairy tales the circle is a magical thing and potent, and possibly the Publishers' Circle has been better named than its christeners knew.

Simple lunching and practical thinking, this might be adopted as the motto of the Circle, which, in its essence, is a social body, an expression of good fellowship among the younger spirits of publishing. But good fellowship and good business may be good comrades; especially when they lunch with Spartan frugality. So in both senses the Publishers' Circle must now be counted a force. Nay, it is a growing force which may make its mark not merely on the book world, viewed as a trade, but on the new English literature which that trade places in the hands of the people.

"Simple lunching and practical thinking" are admirable, especially as both have hitherto been entirely out of the compass of the average book manufacturer. We naturally rejoice to hear also that the Young Publishers (Heaven bless them!) are knocking—yes, knocking—at the doors of the literary agent and the author in particular. Let them knock; it will do them good. Meanwhile, however, the Book Monthly might endeavour to take the sand out of its eye; inasmuch as when the Book Monthly babbles of the "new English literature," which the Young Publisher (Heaven bless him!) is placing in the hands of the people, the Book Monthly is getting right away from decent literary journalism. Nobody can look through the lists of the Young Publisher without perceiving that in his hands English literature simply cannot exist. In consequence, no doubt, of his frugal lunches his mind is just as much set on English literature as it is set on the middle of next week. In point of fact, he abhors English literature and abhors it from the depth of his soul. And he abhors it with all the deeper an abhorrence now that he finds it impossible to sell his cheap lines in classics and his cut-throat reprints of works newly out of copyright. The new literature our fine young gentleman is placing in the hands of the people is always scandalously illiterate and frequently obscene, or, as he choicely puts it, "very hot" to boot. His "successes"—and it is for rapid and colossal successes that he pants, as the hart pants after the waterbrook or as Texas pants for Taft—are invariably and without exception based upon material which is a disgrace to letters and a standing monument to the havoc which the Education Act and an unscrupulous hapenny press have wrought upon the mentality and moral outlook of the country. The Book Monthly will probably learn before it is much older that the Young Publishers are worth precious little to anybody and absolutely nothing to English literature. After writing most charmingly and in its best Shorterian manner about the Publishers' Circle, our contemporary prints an interview with Mr. Arthur Waugh, who is the "first chairman" of the Publishers' Circle, and who is described by the Book Monthly as "man of letters and managing director of the old publishing house of Chapman and Hall." Now, Mr. Arthur Waugh has never figured in our mind's eye as a Young Publisher. In point of fact, he is not a Young Publisher; and even the Book Monthly is very careful to get in the epithet "old" when it speaks of the publishing house of Chapman and Hall. Neither is it anything but flattery to say of Mr. Arthur Waugh that he is a man of letters. What has he done, said or written to justify such a description of him? He used to be a journalist, and he has executed without discredit a considerable amount of hack writing for publishers. There is nothing in the least distinguished or extraordinary to his account, and it would be just as fair to call him poet as to call him man of letters—unless, of course, one were to do it in the sense that Mr. Pawling, of Heinemann's, was once dubbed "author." It is singular, too, that in "Who's Who" this Mr. Waugh writes himself down "author." And especially is it singular in view of the fact that in the course of the Book Monthly's interview Mr. Waugh goes out of his way to make a direct attack upon the honour of authors as a body. It is true that in making this attack Mr. Waugh would appear to have got frightened the moment the word author slipped out of his mouth. Here is what he is reported to have said:

It has been, for instance, quite a common thing for a bookseller to assure a publisher that he is getting much better terms from a colleague in the same street, and until the Circle was instituted I think it will be agreed that it was seldom that publishers would compare notes upon matters of this kind. The same thing is true of authors, or, rather, perhaps one should say of authors' agents. It has been the commonest thing for an agent to come to a publisher with a book, assuring him of the enormous sales which some other firm has had for the same author's last book, and upon the strength of these representations large advances have been paid which, as a matter of fact, could never have been earned.

Mr. Waugh proceeds to tell a fearful story of a literary agent who "came to our firm offering a book by an author, the sale of whose last work, he assured me, had amounted to 5,000 copies. I told him I was confident that this was not the case. He replied by assuring me that it was. When the agent had left the room I rang up the publisher of the book in question, and he informed me that the entire sales had amounted to 572 copies!" "The same thing," says Mr. Waugh, "is true of authors." Mr. Waugh may or may not be able to produce his instance; we doubt if he has an instance worth the name. Authors do not lie about their sales. In the first place, he is a wise author who in the course even of a lifetime can discover what his sales really are. There is not a literary agent in London who, if he were so disposed, could fail to prove by documentary evidence that the Young Publishers, at any rate, are exceedingly handy with the royalty account, and that if you do not watch them the chances are that your sales will be grossly understated and your cheque, which, nine times out of ten, is a wonderfully belated cheque, is much smaller than it ought to be. Even where an inspection of the publisher's books is stipulated for in an author's contract it is the most difficult thing in the world to arrive at the real statement of sales. This is common knowledge; and no one in his senses doubts it. On the other hand, we admit that it is difficult of proof; largely because the literary agents dare not open their mouths on the subject and the average author is equally afraid. Besides which, when such cases are actually brought home to a publisher he always gets behind the excuse of "defective book-keeping." A publisher does not keep his own books, and you must not hold him morally responsible for the carelessness of his clerks. Which is fudge, but it serves. Not many years ago the head of a publishing house, who is considered one of the "smartest men of business" in the trade, was examined in bankruptcy. And on being questioned closely as to the state of his accounts he solemnly assured the court that he was not a man of business and that he had been in the habit of leaving these matters to his accountants.

Mr. Waugh has told the Book Monthly that "this sort of thing"—meaning the exaggeration of authors or authors' agents—"has been largely put a stop to by the mutual confidence of members of the Publishers' Circle." On this question of sales alone we wonder what would happen if the members of the Publishers' Circle were to tell one another all they know, say, about other publishers' methods of account-keeping and general dealing with authors. And we wonder what would happen to the Young Publishers if the authors and editors of London were to form an Authors' Circle for cheap lunches and mutual confidences. At the first meeting of such a Circle we could produce, for our own part, a few highly exhilarating documents which tend to show that the Young Publishers are a very bright and engaging company. We could exhibit, for example, a royalty account which has been rendered in a beautiful commercial hand twice at the end of periods of six months—unaccompanied by the harmless necessary cheque. We could exhibit, also, a correspondence which proves that £80 was paid to an author in settlement of royalties by a publishing firm which is still doing business in London and which asserted thrice in writing that there were no royalties due to the author, and that the book had resulted in a loss. And we could exhibit, further, the cheque of a well-known publishing house which has been twice dishonoured during the last three months, and which still remains unpaid. Of course, these things have nothing to do with Mr. Arthur Waugh or Messrs. Chapman and Hall, or with the members of the Publishers' Circle, who, for anything we know to the contrary, conduct their business on legitimate and straightforward lines. But if Mr. Arthur Waugh, whether as man of letters or managing director of Messrs. Chapman and Hall, or as chairman of the Publishers' Circle, begins to make sweeping and ex parte charges against authors he will find that it is quite easy for the very next person who knows anything about authorship to produce a hundred particular and disconcerting charges against the publishing trade. The best thing the Publishers' Circle can do is to go on exchanging its mutual confidences and to keep them strictly to itself. Lie low and say nothing!

We have not yet finished with Mr. Arthur Waugh. He is reported by the Book Monthly to have committed himself to the following statements:

Personally, I feel that most of us are willing to pay an author whatever his book can fairly earn. The competition for good books becomes keener every year, and everyone wants to have a strong list, so long as there is room for reasonable profit, or—on the lowest basis—so long as there is no loss. In the past, however, this competition has been allowed to gain ground to such an extent that authors have been frequently receiving as much—or half as much—again as their books have any chance of earning. In the future it ought to be increasingly possible, through the exertions of the Circle, for an author to get just as much for his book as he is entitled to—and no more.

It is clear from these words that Mr. Waugh is possessed of a curious intelligence. Did he, as author or man of letters, ever hear of an author or man of letters who can get more than the worth of a book or anything like the worth of a book in the way of an advance on account of royalties? Of course, the stock answer to these queries is that Mr. So-and-so was paid £3,000 on account of royalties in such a year, and Messrs. So-and-so, who paid, burnt their fingers to the tune of £500. Or again, that in such a year Miss So-and-so was paid £3,000, and that Messrs. So-and-so have still a large remainder of the book, which they will be glad to sell at remainder prices. Such things have happened, and nobody denies it. But the publishing trade does not build fine houses and keep valets and winter at Monte Carlo out of jobs of this sort. Taking authors in the lump, we doubt if they ever obtain more than a third of the real value of a book by way of advance on account of royalties. And as for an author being paid for his book "just as much as he is entitled to and no more," who in the name of goodness is to decide with such nicety what he is entitled to? It can be proved that when the decision is left with the publisher the author usually receives from £20 to £30 for a novel of from 90,000 to 100,000 words. And, as a matter of fact, if the publishers had their way no author would be paid a penny-piece, but would rather be invited to contribute to the initial expenses of publication. Nobody can really decide what a book is worth until it has been published and sold. If the Publishers' Circle intend to decide, you may wager your old hat that they will decide with enormous margins in favour of the publisher. Mr. Waugh is most anxious to assure the world at large that there is nothing in the least antagonistic to authors in the Publishers' Circle. We must take him at his word, but we shall, nevertheless, advise all authors, young, old or betwixt and between, to squeeze out of their publishers as much money as ever they can and to keep all they get; because, with all their getting, they are unlikely to approximate to their just dues. The talk now so common among publishers as to friendliness and mutual understanding between author and publisher is mere and sheer nonsense. Not very long ago we had the spectacle of a bankrupt publisher's wife writing in the Times to advocate "confidence" between author and publisher. It were just as reasonable to advocate confidence between the tiger and the lamb. Where is the working author, who, having yielded up his confidence and put aside his caution and common-sense, has not had bitter cause for regretting it? Shall we receive a single letter from an author who will say that "Messrs. So-and-so, the publishers, have had the control of the whole of my books for five years past, and I consider that I have been justly treated by them"? Why is it that when you want a complete set of an author's works you have to get them from pretty nearly as many publishers as he happens to have written books? We shall be told, of course, that the author or his agent is an unfair, unreasonable and greedy person, whom nothing can content, and who is always wanting more money. But he changes his publishers when he can get more money, and when a new publisher will offer him more for a book than he has been in the habit of getting. The inference is plain. The whole question is full of difficulties for people who do not wish to understand it, and it bristles with opportunities for the raising of false issues. Broadly, however, the root of the trouble lies in the publisher's ingrained contempt for literature and his besotted admiration for saleable claptrap. There is not a publisher in London who would plank down a penny-piece on literature qua literature until the author of it has achieved sales. If a fine book by a new hand goes into certain publishing offices the inevitable result is a letter from the publishers explaining to the author that his reader "thinks well of the work," but that as it is a first book it would be necessary for the author to contribute, say, £100 to the cost of publication. For the author's talents, for the author's labour, not to mention his good sense, the publisher thus shows an impudent contempt. All the time he has before him a reader's report, in which the book is extolled and recommended as a saleable article, and in point of fact, he is quite prepared to print the book at his own risk, or, for that matter, to pay the author as much as £100 on account of a ten or a fifteen per cent. royalty. Yet he will try first to get money out of the author, and, failing that, to get possession of the book for nothing. Even your author who has "made sales" can never be sure of a market for anything which does not happen to be fiction. A publisher cannot look at any writer outside of what the publishers consider to be that writer's "line." The author who writes a novel which happens to sell is doomed to novel-writing for the rest of his life. And nine times out of ten his work brings him less and less money as the years go by. If he achieves a "success" he is told that he is extremely unlikely to do it again, and must, therefore, content himself with a small advance. And if by any chance he produces a "failure"—and a man's failures are not always his worst work—he will never get over it till his dying day. The fact is that books are not nowadays considered on their literary merits at all. Before the average publisher will venture a shilling his desire is to be bolstered up by certificates of previous sales and with assurances from his travellers that they can sell the book. Failing these, he must have money down from the author or the right to publish without payment. We do not wish to rail against publishers as a class, if they will only stick to business. But when they begin to pose as the friends and patrons of letters and the well-wishers and benefactors of authors we shall always take leave to dissent.

REVIEWS

A FIFTEENTH CENTURY RATIONALIST

Reginald Pecock's Book of Faith. Edited, with an introductory essay by J. L. MORISON, M.A. (Maclehose & Sons, 5s. net.)

MR. MORISON'S book deserves careful consideration, if only for the care which he has bestowed upon it, and in many respects it is a successful work. It contains a preface, an essay on the development of fifteenth century opinion, a summary of the contents of Pecock's text, the text itself, a glossary, an index of the authors quoted in "The Book of Faith," and a general index to the volume. The preface is occupied with the unique manuscript now printed for the first time, which was presented by Whitgift to Trinity College, Cambridge. "According to Dr. Montague James it is written in a hand of the early fifteenth century, and contains many marginal notes, some of them almost as early as the manuscript itself." Three pages later, Mr. Morison concludes that "'The Book of Faith' may be placed somewhere about 1456," a highly likely date. No one has placed it as early as 1447, and Mr. Morison states positively that the manuscript was the one corrected up-to-date for use in 1457. This is also very likely, but he gives no reasons for his statement. He accounts for cross-references in "The Book of Faith" and another of Pecock's books, "The Represser," reasonably enough, by supposing a habit of his of writing several works concurrently. The discrepancy between these dates Mr. Morison leaves unnoticed. It is curious that in tracing the uses made of the book he should have omitted all mention of what at least is a curious coincidence. In the controversy between Whitgift, who owned the manuscript, and Thomas Cartwright on the Admonition to the Parliament about 1572, Whitgift shows a cast of thought similar to Pecock's, especially in "The Represser." This is still more evident in the great book which was the outcome of that controversy, Hooker's "Ecclesiastical Polity."

As regards the text, Mr. Morison states that the spelling of the manuscript with all its variations has been retained, except in cases of obvious absurdity, etc. It is a great pity that he made any exceptions at all, and that the runic th was not retained, however insignificant. Absurdity and insignificance are of the essence of English spelling from first to last. A manuscript should be printed, especially for the first time, litteratim, even erratim. Otherwise its accuracy becomes suspect, particularly at the present time, for there is a great deal of dishonest carelessness in popular editions, ostensibly exact, which are "generally edited" wholesale by professors of scholarship who ought to know better than to lend their official authority to supervision too comprehensive for them to perform it adequately. The publishers are not to blame. Mr. Morison is perfectly candid, if his judgment is open to criticism, but it is time that some protest was made, and it is made here, because it has no personal application to him.

The glossary is exactly sufficient, very few words, if any, should be added, and it has an interest in itself. A glance at it is sufficient to learn several curious forms in use at the period, particularly, arumme, far (a-room) from; culum, a dove (colomkill, columba); Donet, a primer; myir, mire (some justification for using such words as dissyllables); stid, a place, and stideli, with hild, a lean-to (forms of the Scandinavian sted and held); slider, slippery (still used locally, "slick and slider," also Scandinavian and really meaning "worn"); tikel, delicate; and squaymose, an early form of the later, useful, "squamous," which now, again, might be criticised as a pedantic Latinism. Reference to the glossary, however, is seldom necessary in reading Pecock's text, even to the inexperienced in fifteenth century English, if they keep their heads and use their wits. In fact, the quaintness of the forms will help to carry them through the horrible verbosity and confusion of Pecock's style. The atmosphere of Mr. Morison's introduction suggests excuses in the supposed illiteracy of the period. There are no excuses, nor was the period in the least illiterate. If it is not fair to cite the prose of Sir John Maundeville and of Chaucer, Pecock had among his other immediate predecessors an excellent model in the prose of a perfectly clear writer on kindred subjects, Wyclif. He compares equally badly with his contemporaries, such as Sir John Fortescue, Caxton, and even the Paston and other Fenn letters. He was, in fact, the worst writer of his period, and it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that his confused style is the expression of confusion of thought. This is the more remarkable, since he was very learned and a thinker of considerable force and originality, though his editors all tend to exaggerate these qualities, representing him as a sort of founder of English rationalism. This arises partly from entire inability to realise the mediæval spirit, and partly to that concealment of the Middle Ages by modern writers which almost amounts to a policy. Mr. Morison is no exception to this rule, for though he writes with candour and no more than legitimate sympathy with his subject, he forgets or ignores the intellectual and artistic activity of Pecock's period even in England, though it was not on a level at that time with the rest of civilised Europe. He is particularly unfortunate in his reference to the poetry of the period. Pecock, he says, "was the man of a depressing time and country. Round him dull poets were chanting, in broken notes, of hopeless subjects." He forgets that Chaucer was as accessible to the men of the fifteenth century as to those of any other period, for though printing had not multiplied copies of his works, they were written in the current language of the day. And he forgets that a large number of his own contemporaries as capable of judging as himself still regard Chaucer as unequalled by any English poet since except Shakespeare and Milton. He also forgets that two excellent lyric poets of James I. and Charles d'Orleans were both writing in England during Pecock's lifetime, with five or six minor poets such as Gower, Hoccleve, Lydgate and Capgrave, quite equal in merit to the poets of secondary rank in the Elizabethan or Carolingian periods; and above all that the reign of Henry VI. was remarkable for beautiful popular lyrics, if Pecock had had the imagination and taste to appreciate them.

Pecock's honesty of purpose, his isolation, the evident fact that he was condemned largely for political reasons, which Mr. Morison does not sufficiently explain, do entitle him to our sympathy, but it is alienated by his ridiculous vanity, his sophistry, and the futility of his objects. His course was such as to lead him inevitably to the faggots at any time when they were used to clench an argument, and the recantation by which he avoided them seems to have been inspired less by fear than by the recognition that the expression of his speculations were not worth either death or excommunication from the Church, which he acknowledged as a credible witness to truths beyond the reach of reason. Mr. Morison also does not make it sufficiently clear that Pecock, though threatened with the stake, was not actually deposed from his bishopric, and that his theories were never condemned by Rome. He appealed to Rome and a new trial was ordered, the documents of which, together with Pecock himself, were to be sent to Rome. This never took place, Pecock considering it wiser to resign his see and accept the punishment inflicted at the first trial, rather than run the risks of a second English trial which might have resulted in the stake in defiance of the Pope's authority. It is not yet sufficiently clear whether Pecock's theories were technically heretical or not. Their unorthodoxy has been exaggerated by English writers, formerly with the desire to represent him as a precursor of the Reformation, latterly as a pioneer of rationalism. He has even been regarded as a follower of Wyclif, though, as he states, he spent twenty years in arguing against Lollardy. His writings give grounds for both the former views, but quite inadequate grounds, for they also combat the theory that the Bible was the sole guide in faith and morals, and strongly support the authority of the Church and defend many customs equally obnoxious to Protestantism and Rationalism. Nor does it appear at all certain, as Mr. Morison seems to suppose, because he wrote on important religious matters to the people in the vernacular, but because he addressed to them obscure speculations in ambiguous terms. Though Mr. Morison points out that Pecock incurred odium by his supposed attack on the exposition of the faith in sermons when he preached at St. Paul's Cross, he seems to suppose that the doctrines of the Church were not expounded in the vernacular, and thus again shows an inability to grasp the mediæval idea. If Pecock was even an incipient rationalist in the modern acceptance of the term, like so many others he failed before the tribunal to which he appealed, for he does not carry his arguments to their inevitable consequences, so that they are singularly unconvincing. Mr. Morison, too, in his enthusiasm for reason, seems to forget that an appeal to reason in its low forms also led in Pecock's time as it does now to irrational consequences.

CANON FLEMING

Life of Canon Fleming. By ARTHUR FINLAYSON.
(James Nisbet and Co., Ltd., 6s. net.)

IN giving to the world this timely appreciation of a true gentleman and a thorough-going follower of the highest ideals, the Rev. Arthur Finlayson has acted wisely. For many years Canon Fleming was a well-known figure in the religious life of London, and the echoes of tributes which came from all quarters at the news of his death last autumn have not yet died away. His ministry as Vicar of St. Michael's, Chester Square, was a remarkable one—his congregation often included some of the wealthiest and most famous in the land and some of the poorest and least significant in his own parish, yet to them all he became beloved, a tower of strength, a man among men. His far-reaching influence came from no special distinction in argument, from no laurels of learning, but from the innate power and personality of the man himself. Humility was the keynote of his conduct—he refused positions the most coveted, strove mightily and happily for objects that were important only in their human relationships and results, served always unwaveringly the truth as his reason and his beliefs indicated it to him. The honour of Royal commands came frequently to him, and it gives a flash of insight into his comprehensive and genial character when we remember that the man thus favoured for his integrity and merit could at the same time interest himself in a coffee-house for the benefit of the poorer residents of his district, or spend quiet, simple hours at the babies' crèche connected with his church; it becomes an easy matter to understand why his welcome was so universal.

The value of this volume, however, lies not only in its depiction of the lowly and loyal spirit whose thoughts and aspirations are thus illumined. Canon Fleming met many notable men of his time, and the plentiful reminiscences add greatly to the interest of the work. Macready was a personal friend of his, and several of the famous actor's letters are reproduced; a common bond between the two was their extreme appreciation of the faculty of elocution. Many of our readers doubtless know the treatise entitled "The Art of Reading and Speaking," which Canon Fleming published, and which met with considerable success. Beaconsfield, Gladstone, Sir Andrew Clark, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Tennyson, Dean Farrar, Matthew Arnold—these are a few of the celebrities about whom we hear, either directly or indirectly. Miss Agnes Weston's magnificent enterprise, too, on behalf of the sailors of the Navy, is referred to at some length; it appears to have been due originally to a sermon of the Canon when he was in charge of All Saints', at Bath, in the year 1858. The letters which are quoted—perhaps a little too copiously quoted—contain much that is worthy of attention, and those to his son Malcolm—his "very dear Malcolm"—are charming. The concluding passage from one of the latter seems not without special point at the present day:

I do not agree with you as to the Conservatives being unpatriotic. I think you will live to confess that the unpatriotic man is a Prime Minister who, in order to stay in, humiliates his country in the eyes of all Europe, who cringes to Russia, and almost begs for peace at any price. I fear the Nemesis will be a deadly struggle for our very existence a little later on, if indeed Gladstone has not already ruined his country. With fondest love, ever your devoted FATHER.

Naturally, the biography of such a man as Canon Fleming would not lack a few good anecdotes. We may take one or two for our readers' amusement without trespassing indiscreetly on the author's forbearance. When lecturing at the St. John's Hall, High-bury, one of the Theological schools of the University of London, his patience with the students seems to have been a salient feature of the proceedings:

In the olden days at Shrewsbury, if a boy in construing a classical author made a false quantity, Dr. Kennedy would throw up his arms and exclaim: "Ah! the anguish of my soul! I'll give up education altogether!" But Fleming was always calm, self-controlled, courteous, and dignified. "We pronounce that 'stormy,'" he would quietly say to some unfortunate student who said "stawmy," and who would probably make the same mistake again. . . .

In the reading class he would occasionally allow his humour to appear. "Inattention to a trifle is enough to turn the best of reading into the worst vulgarity. Mind your stops; the comma may seem trivial, but it is often very important. At a banquet a man reading from the toast-list, 'Woman, without her, man would be a savage,' misplaced the comma and startled everyone by reading, 'Woman, without her man, would be a savage. Or again, a poor woman coming late to church wrote on a piece of paper: 'A sailor going to sea, his wife desires the prayers of the congregation for his safety.' The unfortunate curate read out to the astonished congregation: 'A sailor going to see his wife, desires the prayers of the congregation for his safety.'"

And there is a little bon mot attributed to Bishop Magee that is worthy of quotation:

On one occasion Mr. Gladstone met Magee and said, "I hear, my lord, that you don't quite approve of my dealing with the Irish question?" whereupon Magee, who possessed a wonderful gift of repartee, said, "It is not your dealing that I mind, Mr. Gladstone, it's your shuffling that I object to."

It is inevitable that in such a book as this, written by a warm personal friend and admirer, a certain amount of matter should occur which is of no particular moment to the general reader. Portions of the lengthy extracts from testimonials, special sermons, letters, etc., which can only be slurred by persons who never had the privilege of knowing Canon Fleming, might conceivably have been omitted with advantage; some of the letters of appreciation, too, are from people whose opinions are not of any distinction. Apart from this quite explicable drawback, the book is one which will please all who ever heard or met the Canon, whether intimately or at the impersonal distance of the pulpit, and, as we have shown, its value extends beyond the bounds of his own personality. Reproductions of autograph letters from their Majesties Queen Alexandra and Queen Maud of Norway, and other Royalties, are appended, and a portrait of the Canon (facing page 338) deserves very special mention; it suggests the fine character, the inherent goodness of the man better than much writing could do. The whole book is a worthy memorial of one whose motto might well have been "Love in Action."

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Stairway of Honour. By MAUD STEPNEY RAWSON. (Mills and Boon, 6s.)

THE division into three groups which the author has made in this volume of short stories is quite a happy idea. The first, "Tales of the Olden Days," explains itself; the second, "Tales of Yesterday," is concerned with bright little pictures of the eighteenth century; the third, "Tales of To-day," presents a few aspects of modern life. All the sketches are clever; one or two are little more than impressions, and perhaps lay themselves open to the charge of being "thin"; but we cannot all emulate the art of Mr. Henry James in the unparalleled cameos of his earlier period. To select a couple by name from those which merit special approval, we may indicate "Pepita and the King" as a pretty little idyll, in which a country lass opens her heart to a "regular royal" King, and talks to him with considerable frankness, imagining all the time that he was a person of no particular consequence; and, on the modern side, the story of "The Marriage Merchant" is rather a smart piece of work. "A Visit to the Enchantress," however, strikes a very improbable and strained note. Unequal quality is, of course, inseparable from any collection of short tales, and it is pleasant to record that in this case the average is high.

For Church and Chieftain. By MAY WYNNE. (Mills and Boon, 6s.)

WE believe that this book is of the description which from most newspaper critics obtains the title of "a stirring romance." "Stirring" seems to be a somewhat apt word in this connection, since we are irresistibly reminded of the formula generally associated with cookery-books—take two or three pairs of lovers, a few castles, a secret passage, some hairsbreadth escapes and perilous adventures, stir well together and serve in a stormy period of history, and the final result ought to please all reasonable people. For some cause or other this story fails to please us, and it may well be that from the author's point of view we seem unreasonable; but although we have not discovered any serious flaw in her construction or in the actual writing, the fact remains that her characters carry little sense of reality. Ireland, in the troublous times of the English Queen Elizabeth, is the scene of the action, but, if we may be permitted so quick a change of metaphor in a short notice, the author forgets that it is not of much use merely to manufacture a stained-glass window of a rare and complicated pattern unless a strong light shines behind it. Here the light of inspiration is rather feeble, and the story is ineffective; it fails to hold the reader's attention save in its detached incidents. We are sorry to be unable to commend it, for considerable pains have evidently been taken in its evolution.

Olive in Italy. By MORAY DALTON. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THERE is something disarming about a first novel: it is "almost certain to be, whatever else it is, full of industry and solemnity and fire"; and our expectations are raised by the fact that it forms part of the First Novel Library, which was to include only the first novels of such new authors who showed exceptional talent. The present work, the sixteenth of this series, has its full share of the expected solemnity and fire; its author has the gift of telling a story with spirit and energy, if somewhat over-emphatically; the close of many a chapter makes an effective "curtain"; while the three "books" into which the story is divided are full of pleasant vignettes of Italy, and the fragrance and art of Siena, Florence, and Rome.

But with all due deduction for the vigour and narrative quality of the story, there is little distinction in the odyssey of the orphan girl, Olive Agar, teacher of English at Siena, governess at Florence, and artist's model at Rome; in her meeting with the player of Chopin, Jean Avenel; in her pursuit by the Prince Tor di Rocca, and the latter's final discomfiture—for he is discomfited, as the motto on the fly-leaf of the book is:

For in the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full mixed, and He poureth out of the same. As for the dregs thereof: all the ungodly, the earth shall drink them. . . .

The chief defect of the book is the unreality of its characters, none of which attains to real flesh and blood. Each, oddly enough, appears to have his or her original in the sculpture galleries of Europe. The ill-fated Gemma, whose beauty had "the strange boding loveliness of a pale orchid," and whom the "students of the University of Siena named the Odalisque," is compared to the "Capuan Psyche" (and, again, not very felicitously, to "a silent Sappho"!); Jean Avenel, most unconvincing of heroes, has a face like the bust of Julius Cæsar in the British Museum, but differs from the less fortunate Roman in possessing "black hair, rather longer than is usual in this country." Prince Tor di Rocca has a "Neronian upper lip." He is also "handsome as a fawn might be, and as a tiger is, not sleek, but lean and brown, with hot insolent eyes and a fine and cruel mouth," and with a great emerald sparkling on the little finger of his left hand—the ideal of a non-moral superman!

The dialogue on occasions falls into the florid and Bulwer Lytton manner, as may be judged by the following excerpt, which is intended to represent the conversation of two mondains in a box at the opera-house at Siena:

"The Capuan Psyche and a rose from the Garden of Eden," said a man in the stage-box, who had discerned Olive's fresh, eager prettiness beyond the pale beauty of the Odalisque.

He handed the glasses to his neighbour: "Choose. The rôle of Paris is a thankless one; it involved death in the end for the shepherd-prince."

"Yes, but you are not a shepherd-prince."

Yes, but such people do not say such things!

An Adventure in Exile. By RICHARD DUFFY. (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.)

"AN Adventure in Exile" is a good title, but it has the advantage of the book, which has little of exile and less of adventure. Indeed exile is a brave word for the short villegatura of the hero, Lloyd Avery, who is haunted by the "hue of the far-off." We expect him to be finely touched to fine issues. He is sick of the marionette-play of society, of the "luncheons and dinners, dances, theatres, suppers, everything that makes up the old grind of life" he had lived for ten years. He thinks of the distant view of his château d'exil:

The whole world seemed to lie between him and the tiled roof, symbol of the far-away. The lure was beckoning him, as often before when he had not heeded. In differing guise it beguiled the soldier of fortune, the sailor, the tramp, and wanderers of whatsoever name in all corners of the earth. It called to all men. Many yielded, many more resisted though hearkening fearsomely in the penal round of daily duties.

Well and good; we expect the charm of distant horizons, some active wandering—but the romantic note, once sounded, dies away. Avery goes—to Normandy, to a perfectly habitable château near the not inaccessible Falaise, where he meets with his adventure, the woman he eventually marries, a Madame de Lescure, who allows herself to be addressed by the peasants as Madame la Sainte! Their attraction is told with all the familiar intensity of the feuilleton:

She became silent under his searching gaze. The humid red tone of her lips paled, though the radiant eyes of amethyst met his unflinching. Understanding, vague, yet penetrant, waved between them. . . . Lids veiled the eyes of amethyst, and at the corners of the mouth lurked shadows of the enigmatic smile.

Each of their meetings had been epochal, and the other days of his life were null. His old self fell from him like a garment, life was born in him again, and she was his life. On the last page:

The eyes of amethyst looked surrender into his and closed as she gave him her lips.

We confess to a certain slight prejudice against a book where sombre is spelt "somber," and the hero has a "well-molded" face. There are, however, some blots which are not confined to the English of America; Lady Grove would notice the use of the word "ride" for the "action of sitting in a cab." The awkwardness of "My comrade acts like he had a woman on his mind," is perhaps to be attributed to the humour of the comic American; but the too picturesque strength of "Mrs. Herbert dropped the maternal pose, and shed on them both, eyes, teeth, lips in smiling languor," is the author's own deliberate work. When too, will the convention disappear, that English like: "At this hour so matinale nobody visits the park" induces the illusion that we are in France?

The matter of the conversation is not much better than the style; here are some brilliants of very inferior taste:

"At twenty-five a man is afraid he will get married, despite his best intentions. At thirty-five he's afraid he won't."

"At thirty-five," said Stéphanie, smiling above very white, small teeth, "a woman no longer fears, she is in despair."

Altogether, the book is a vapid book; there is none of the impact of the writer's personality, none of the "emotion," that constituent which Professor Holmes in his new book postulates as the first of all necessities in picture making, and is no less an essential of novel-making. Each sentence, each phrase might be transferred from the mouth of one character to one of the others; no one has a peculiar note, an accent of individuality. The shadowy puppets move listlessly through their tedious parts in an artificial and not very perfectly valued scene.

The Ideas of a Plain Country-woman. (Constable, 3s.)

It has been said that every American village possesses three poets, two female and one male. Our "Plain Country-woman" is one of these poets of the village. She, it is claimed in the preface, has lived deeply and "touches the vital well-springs of living with a hand that we feel is that of experience." She reflects, with all the inherent drawbacks of the American idiom, the "reveries of thousands of women," while the headings of her chapters—"Philosophies of a House-cleaning Day," "The Simple Life," "Some Needs of Women," "The Truth About Love," and, lastly, "The Reflections of a Grandmother"—indicate clearly the class she intends to reach—and probably reaches.

Her attitude to all these things is almost too healthy; her book is full of the praise of poverty, the austeries of housework, the simple life, and the homeliness of the home on the ragged edge of a little Indiana town with the plain fields and a fringe of flat woodland behind it.

What is the "peculiar charm" of these writings, what wins her the millions of readers—principally women—vouched for by the preface? "People by the millions have read and are to-day each week and each month reading the writings of the 'Plain Country-woman,' irrelevant as it may be in her eyes and their eyes, and they have read with pleasure and profit." And yet she speaks with no authority; she has few settled convictions; nothing but "leanings toward certain doctrines, and among them the idea of reincarnation"; her education stopped short of a common school course. In literature she admires those "rare books," "Cranford," "Rebecca" and "Elizabeth and her German Garden," while she surprises us with putting the question, "Why Mrs. Humphry Ward persists in giving us immoral women as heroines in her books?" whereas Mrs. Humphry Ward's heroines are often noticeable for their excess of conscience! Her philosophy is that of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," also from America; her language somewhat over-emphatic, as when she speaks feelingly of books "bristling with immoralities told in language suggestive enough to rouse the flagging sense of interest in minds steeped and dulled in sensational details of rotten society." It is possible that the author's taste is inherited from her mother, whose "taste in literature was absolutely unerring," and who swept aside, as all bright and good women should, the inconsequent, the deleterious, and the unpleasant in literature, choosing restful tales of quiet English farm life, strong stories of travel and adventure, true-hearted stories of the nobler type, and now and then a yarn like "Wild Bill" or the "Heroes of the Plains"!

The author, in very early days, when inwardly rebelling against her copper-toed shoes and waterproof cloak, wished herself like a neighbour's little girl "resplendent in pretty and fashionable garments." She was told, however, by her mother that the rich little girl was common—that she lived in a rented house and her mother used bad grammar. Whatever association a rented house conveys to the American we cannot say; to the English mind there is nothing so very seriously damning in it; while imperfect grammar and misuse of English is not infrequent in the pages of the "Plain Country-woman," who, we are told, "had great pretensions to gentility." "March," she writes, "is a fortuitous birth month," though the context shows that she wishes to say fortunate or favourable. Her metaphors now and then are very masquerades of imagery led by the very lord of misrule:

"Can we not trample upon the shackles we ourselves have forged by simply running to seed on proprieties and social ethics?" she asks? How shall such a writer grow or educe a figurative conscience, that is to say, be more conscientious in the use of figures, and resist the temptation to ignore the implications of metaphor?

Turning from the style to the contents of the book we are dismayed by the succession of platitude and ineptitude, of savourless narrative and scullery philosophy. Let us take a few aphorisms from these chapters (whose purpose, by the way, is to "reassure women a little as to the purpose of their being"):

We are constituted a gregarious race.

When you are downhearted, a laugh is the only thing that will cure you.

I would write a book about the duties of fatherhood if I thought the men would read it—but they wouldn't.

I have just lost a friend who was an ideal father. Of course he was a gentleman; an ideal father could not be otherwise.

The family usually has its origin in the union of a young couple irresistibly drawn together by the sex attraction.

It is a doctrine of mine that the quality of mind does not change with what we call civilisation, except for the worse.

It is a favourite maxim of mine that the real joys of life are not for the few that belong to the common lot.

The world has run to seed on (sic) doing the proper thing. The tameness of it is terrible, and I do not wonder men break away and commit immoralities to interrupt the fearful monotony of elegance and correctness in which nice women are contented to live.

I remember days better than years, and some of the days seem the longer—no doubt they are.

I asked a farmer the other day which month in the year was hardest on man and beast, and he replied, "March—March—March by long odds."

Such is the wisdom of the "Plain Country-woman," whose writings are more popular than the writings of any single contributor to the Ladies' Home Journal, and who claims to have "sensed some of the mysteries of life and death before she was five years old." Was it really necessary, we wonder, to reserve all rights, "including that of translation into foreign languages, including the Scandinavian? Probably not.

AN OUTDOOR BRIEVIARY—IV.

THE most generous of flower-bearing trees is the hawthorn, whose million-eyed flowers lie flatly, like a snow-crust, upon the upper side of the spray, while beneath is an ancient silver-green or bleached trunk and a twisted and intertangled knot of boughs, such as no curious work of old ironsmiths could equal.

Even fuller of flower than the white seems a great red hawthorn in full flower by a waterside, as they are planted by the canal-like ducts and reaches of the Cherwell, where Walter Pater must have seen, every year, from their "bleached and twisted trunks and branches, a plumage of tender crimson fire out of the heart of the wood" burning upon the water, a double light, and dropping their pinkish petals like beads thickly upon its brown-amber surface of smooth water, which is dappled with slanting rules of sunshine and pricked all over with a little dust of flying insects.

In this field there are "borders of gold, with studs of silver." The growing grass is standing thick, and pricked with yellow rattle, dog-daisies and buttercups—the only field where gold and silver is to be had for the picking. Here in a pool of gold, capriciously bright as the one spot in an old picture that has been restored by the hand of a cleaner, are buttercups. The next field is white with daisies—silver studs. A legend seems written here as on vellum with capitals of burnished gold, with a margin ornamented as in ancient missals, with leaves of emerald-green, with tall flowers of gold and azure, like fitted jewels, with stems of silver, tarnished with the lapse of centuries.

"We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver."

Within this ring of larches and beeches a small open space of grass has the comfortable shelter and most fresh stillness of the deeper woods. The scent of life is never fuller in the woods than it is here, for now the ground, covered with the first green wonder-work of summer, a mat of leaves of the commonest weeds—green shafts, arrow-heads, clusters and sprays—is yielding up its hopes, as in the autumn it exhales its memories. Under the multitude of smooth and rugged columns of the copse, between the serpentine roots of the trees, run pools of steely-blue hyacinths; while, in places, pale anemones are powdered, like spring-fallen snow that fades as soon as it alights. In the open grassy plat, the musk of yellow flowers, moving lightly above the grass on their invisible stalks, rises above the fragrance of the shining turf, where clots of scentless celandines are flashing back the sun's radiance.

Here, too, in this valley of cuckoos, that bird breathes out with sweetest emphasis each of his "soft little globes of bosom-shaped sound," and from the beeches, which have opened their silken fans, the hollow brown bud-sheaths are falling, "touching at last so imperceptibly the earth with which they are to mingle that the gesture is much gentler than a salutation, and even more discreet than a discreet caress."

The deep, uncropped grass grows higher under the grey slant-stemmed trees in the orchard, which are covered with vari-coloured bloom, either white flakes of pear-blossom or a fine red powder of uncrumpling apple-buds. Each tree was as if it had been wholly plunged in the very fountain of youth to emerge shining with the dews and fires of that bright water. Its dews had been sprinkled, too, on the grass, which had the bloom of emerald upon it, and upon the small mauve cuckoo-flowers that trembled lightly on their fine stalks; while upon every leaf there was that delicate birth-dew which is upon all things in the first hours of life. A blackbird, with something delicate and sliding in his motion, as if he were gliding along some invisible thread, flew up and away from a swaying bough. And above the bough I looked, and, behold, in the firmament there appeared as it were a sapphire stone, and on it the clouds—caught between the branches, as it were a lock of sheep's wool upon a briar—melted as silver is melted out of the midst of the furnace.

"Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness, like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all the powders of the merchant?" The perfume of the little lime-flowers falls through the air like water-drops, the perfume of the cool-rooted field flowers rises like the spray of a fountain from stream and hedge and meadow.

The long, ripe-seeded grass of the water-meadow, flowing towards the hedge, has risen like a surflless wave and broken over it, high and rank, and rushing into the very bushes. There is a trodden track to the river on one side of the hedge, a shining crease among the russet sorrel-tops and grass-heads, and from every other head among them start the unsown flowers of the air, colourless moths, with their weak, drugged flight, whose wings beat so fast that they wrap them round with a whitish blurr. The hedge—it is Baptist night—is a very via lactea, with its numerous flat-faced wafers of elder-flowers, and its inlay of dog-roses, open and shell-white, or closed and red in narrow bud, and its torchères of meadowsweet. In the "Flora Domestica" the White Iris is spoken of as known to the French as la flamme blanche, but "the white torch or flame" in a cresset seems to catch and cast into the mould of speech the spirit of the meadowsweet.

"Solitude needs no park"; a thicket may be as secret as a forest.

In the densely wooded ghyll the air is heavy with a riot of vegetation and motionless as a canal. The lower scrub is of ash-saplings, matted with bramble, briar and honeysuckle; above lean the greater trunks of trees, closing over the water's channel with the thickness of their growth. In the half-light, the elder lays out her flat-faced flowers; the little hollow is over-arched entirely by boughs, and in its green light the stream, its secret, trickles on its way between high banks of rich red earth, feathery with hart's-tongue ferns. The whole place has the air of some quiet precinct in the sea, secret and untroubled, and is immortally green and peaceful beneath its reticulated shades. Above a little round pool only, there is a gap in the roof. There was nothing to show that this was water but an almost imperceptible internal welling, and now and then a faint lap and dying bubble round its rim; but suddenly there comes a waft of light moving swifter than a weaver's shuttle across it, and the netted shadows shake and blots of darkness within it seem to swell and dwindle, as with respiration.

"My root was spread out by the waters and the dew lay all night upon my branch."

"Go into a field of flowers where no house is builded and eat only of the flowers of the field."

The elders are covered with white wafers of blossom. The grass is thick and heavy-headed in the field, and showing over the green-bronze of just-ripe herbage the fine broken colour made by the dust-browns and blue-greys of the seed-heads powdering the grass; there is lilac-bloom of pollen upon it, as if the shadow of a cloud had patched it; and here and there the tinge of sorrel-flower. The long slope is bright with ragged robin and tall sorrel, and rolls in waves, breaking into foam where the daisies and hemlocks line the hedge.

"I sat among the flowers and did eat of the herb of the field, and the meat of the same satisfied me."

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

APRIL 6TH, 1909.

FREDERICK GILLET, Esq., Vice-President, in the Chair.

The Secretary exhibited, on behalf of Mr. George Jennison, some fertilised eggs from a pair of Seba pythons in the Belle Vue Zoological Gardens, Manchester.

Dr. R. T. Leiper, F.Z.S., exhibited a greatly distorted elephant's tusk from the Congo, and a malformed canine tooth of a hippopotamus from Uganda, the conditions most probably originating from mechanical injury.

Mr. E. T. Newton, F.R.S., F.Z.S., exhibited a metatarsal bone of an ox, showing in a remarkable manner the marks of gnawing by rodents, possibly squirrels, rats, or mice, which he had found in the woods near Cromer.

Mr. R. I. Pocock, F.L.S., F.Z.S., communicated a paper entitled "Description of a new Form of Ratel (Mellivora) from Sierra Leone, with Notes upon the described African Forms of this Genus."

Miss Muriel Robertson read a paper, communicated by Prof. E. A. Minchin, M.A., V.P.Z.S., "On an Ichthyosporidian causing a Fatal Disease in Sea-Trout."

Mr. C. Tate Regan, M.A., F.Z.S., read a paper on a small series of fishes from Christmas Island, collected by Dr. C. W. Andrews, F.R.S., F.Z.S. Seven new species were described, comprising five Blennies, a Pampeneus, and a Cirrhitæ. In connection with the last-named it was pointed out that the Cirrhitidæ, as defined and limited by Dr. Günther, with the addition of Haplodactylus, form a very natural family.

Mr. Hamilton H. Druce, F.L.S., F.Z.S., read a short paper "On some New and Little-known Hesperida from Tropical West Africa," which contained remarks on, and descriptions of, some new forms of these butterflies lately obtained by Mr. G. L. Bates, F.Z.S., on the Ja River, Cameroons, and others from Nigeria. New species of the genera Abantis, Acleros, Gorgyra, Parnara, and Ceratrachia were described.

The next meeting of the Society for scientific business will be held on Tuesday, the 27th April, 1909, at half-past eight o'clock p.m., when the following communications will be made:

1. Dr. T. A. Chapman, F.Z.S.—A Review of the Species of the Lepidopteran Genus Lycanopsis Feld. (Cyaniris auct. nec Dalm.) on examination of the Male Ancillary Appendages.

2. F. E. Beddard, M.A., F.R.S., F.Z.S.—On some Points in the Structure of Galidia elegans, and on the Postcaval Vein in Carnivora.

3. Dr. R. W. Shufeldt, C.M.Z.S.—On the Comparative Osteology of the Passerine Bird Arachnothera magna.

Communications intended for the Scientific Meetings of the Zoological Society of London should be addressed to—

P. CHALMERS MITCHELL (Secretary).

CORRESPONDENCE

"DREADNOUGHTS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I give below some extracts from a publication known as "Manor's Message," seven thousand copies of which are distributed monthly to the residents of a South London borough, and which is issued by the Bermondsey Mission of the United Methodist Free Church, under the editorship of the missionary, Mr. W. Kaye Dunn, B.A. :—

MAD! MAD!! MAD!!!

Eight Dreadnoughts at the hands of the Liberal Government!!! The Christian members of the Liberal Government have one and all backslidden. . . . There are 199 Free Churchmen M.P.'s. . . . The Liberal Caucus, it seems, is for Jingoism.

But they [the Free Churchmen] must stand by their own Government. Why? Is the independent M.P. so defunct? . . .

There is one humble group upon which will be centred the eyes of many Free Churchmen—the Labour Bench, a very Christian Bench indeed. Philip Snowden said at Swansea that he had worked and prayed for years for a union between Free Churchmen and his bench. Thank God his bench stands up bravely to give the blunt Parliamentary lie to this ugly Dreadnought Liberalism. If the Labour Party best interpret my Christian ideal, and at the next election there come for my vote an official Liberal and a Labour man, the Labour man gets that vote though the Tory get in. I would have rejoiced to vote "Labour" at Croydon. The Liberal, who has forgotten to be liberal, will sink and drown, the Labour man will rise to swim another day. I do not give myself to the Labour Party—but they may get my next vote as being the nearest interpretative men of the old message, "Peace on earth, goodwill towards men."

The article is signed "W. Kaye Dunn."

Immediately after appears the following :—

CHURCH BLASPHEMY.

This Sunday evening a Church Lads' Brigade has straggled past my window to the "tune" of fife and drums.

What a blasphemy that the "Church" of Jesus should dress lads up in soldiers' mock uniform, and that, too, on God's Sabbath, on the Day of Peace. That on the day that is peculiarly the day Jesus has made His own, His "Church" should seek by such a pernicious advertisement to put the military devil into the hearts of the growing lads of our district.

If Christ walked our streets and met that ugly imitation of Satan, what would He say?

The Church that belongs to the Military Spirit first and to Jesus secondly, is no church of His and may be written off the list.

W. K. D.

Some time ago a local clergyman of the Church of England was held up to opprobrium for daring, if I remember aright, to be associated with a local publican or two on the borough council, or some such institution, in defiance of the views of the Editor of "Manor's Message."

WILKIE COLLINS AND WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I picked up, the other day, at a second-hand bookshop a copy of one of those annual miscellanies by the sale of which it is hoped to benefit the funds of certain bloated "charities." One of the pictures struck me as being worth the money. But I was soon to discover that I had cheaply purchased treasures of literature also. Among the articles was one by Mr. William Le Queux, entitled "Where I Find My Plots." Feeling profoundly uninterested in the genesis of what Mr. Le Queux is pleased to call his "plots"—ah! those arid and uncultivated plots!—I was about to pass from the essay when my attention was arrested by an allusion to Wilkie Collins. My curiosity was naturally aroused. For what could the ingenious author of "Armada" be doing in that galley? And this is what I read: "With the death of my old friend, Wilkie Collins, the mystery story went out."

Now, Wilkie Collins is less known, personally and in his habit as he lived, than any other writer of equal eminence who wrote in the Victorian era. Students of literature should be legitimately desirous to obtain some reliable information about the social side of his existence. The reputation of Collins justifies—one had almost said, demands—a biography. And behold, here is the very man fully equipped for the enterprise. We should certainly hear more of the "old friend"ship of these two writers. Will Mr. Le Queux "oblige?"—as they used to say at the music-halls. One would like to know, for example, when and under what circumstances the two "old friends" met? Who introduced them? What were the respective ages of the men when they first foregathered? How long did the old friendship last? At which of the meetings of the writers did Wilkie Collins describe his novels as "mystery stories"? And how came it to pass that during the whole course of this old friendship Mr. Le Queux failed to acquire from the Master a little of that Master's skill in the art of construction, his nice discrimination in the portrayal of human character as evinced in a Captain Wragge or a Count Fosco, his mastery of a simple, lucid, grammatical English style? These are points on which one feels that Mr. Le Queux—an he would—might discourse profitably in his own brand of English. I hope that this respectful reminder may induce him to give to the literary world all he knows about his "old friend Wilkie Collins." He may take it from me that readers would find reliable reminiscence of Collins infinitely more to their taste than the frowsy story of the finding of his own "plots." N. N.

A FITTING REMEDY FOR "SUFFRAGETTE" MANIA.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—A letter appeared under this title in your issue of April 10th which it is difficult to let pass unnoticed.

Your correspondent probably forgets that in opening their campaign the Suffragettes omitted to ask the opinion of Mr. Ridley as to how it should be conducted. Mr. Ridley evidently loses sight of the fact that the Suffragettes are convinced that theirs is a just cause.

If he could for a moment imagine himself in their position he might be able to enlighten us as to the manner in which he would carry on such a campaign. He would find that quiet work had been tried for nearly half a century without much obvious result; he would find that large meetings had been held, petitions drawn up and presented, books and pamphlets written, with scarcely a sign of encouragement from the general public.

But he would find that the tactics of the Suffragettes had, if nothing else, roused the popular attention—which was their aim.

Perhaps it still lies with the quiet thinkers and workers to convert the Mr. Riddleys of this world. The constant dripping of water on a stone will, at last, wear a channel.

The Suffragettes will be relieved to hear—through Mr. Ridley—that John Bull has had "his fill" of diversion and "tarantism." And now it is high time he assayed a little reflection and resumed business!

It has been suggested—even in Parliament—that a party of women who could raise such gigantic subscriptions, and who could use their influence so untiringly at the bye-elections, should at least have their requests investigated. Perhaps the fact that many of the Suffragettes repeatedly get themselves imprisoned would help to persuade Mr. Ridley that their "tarantism" is, at least, in earnest. "Demented" and "neurotic" as he states them to be, yet they willingly suffer discomfort, obloquy, and even his storms of vituperation when they think it will help their cause.

So it remains for the "cold douche" of commonsense and the "diet" of common justice to cure these Suffragettes of their "mania."

THOS. HARDY AND GERARD DE NERVAL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Mr. Thomas Hardy's recollections of the Argyle Rooms, in his poem in the English Review, quoted in the last ACADEMY, says a correspondent, are singularly inexact as well as uncharitable. The epithet "boisterous" applied to the dancing is particularly absurd. There was nothing boisterous about the proceedings at the Argyle, which were as decorous as a funeral. In point of fact, nobody danced at the Argyle with the exception of the paid professional dancers, whose evolutions were kept within bounds by the strict supervision of the proprietor. The place was as well ordered as regards externals as the Court of Louis XIV. of France. It is interesting to compare Mr. Hardy's speculation as to the ultimate fate of his partners at the Argyle:—

"Do their spectres spin like sparks within
The smoky halls of the Prince of Sin
To a thunderous Jullien air?"

with the pathetic reference to his youthful loves by the Frenchman, Gerard de Nerval, in Les Cydalises:—

"Où sont nos amoureux?
Elles sont au tombeau!
Elles sont plus heureuses
Dans un séjour plus beau.

"Elles sont près des anges
Dans le fond du ciel bleu,
Et chantent les lozanges
De la Mère de Dieu."

THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

By HOPE PROTHEROE, Author of "One Man's Sin."

An up-to-date novel, in style and method of subject treatment, and a decided advance on "ONE MAN'S SIN." Those who, as a result of reading that book, expect only padding from this author, will, in "THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE," be agreeably disappointed. A rough diamond and a rose would be strange mates indeed; yet no whit more so than the couple of human beings whose story is here presented. How a man may struggle in vain against a force stronger than himself, and a woman become a daily terror to the man who loves her, are graphically portrayed. The sympathy of most will be extended to the man, who, in the depth of his own despair, takes the blame of his wife's action upon himself, and deals forcibly, yet withal in gentlemanly fashion, with his—worse than—interesting mother-in-law. The last chapter leaves the reader with a distinct note of hopefulness and the prospect of the hero's final reclamation, and that at the hands of a woman who has, herself, a "conscientious scruple" that will inevitably affect her future life. It is a book that everyone should read and recommend. It is at times comic, dramatic and sensational, and the interest it inspires is fully sustained to the end.

A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.

A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story offers the kind of fare which will appeal to most readers of fiction. Miss Effie Chamberlayne, the author of "A SHOOTING STAR," comes from a political family; but in addition to her knowledge of affairs, she shows that she possesses, in an uncommon degree, the qualities of imagination and humour that go to make up the successful novelist. The story itself, which is laid mainly in England, is concerned with the possession of some politically "compromising documents"; and the mystery surrounding both the recovery of the papers, and the personality of the Agent attempting the task, is manipulated with a dexterity and a resource not often to be met with in a first effort. "A SHOOTING STAR" leads up by stages to an exciting and dramatic climax in which, however, the probabilities are kept well within bounds. Miss Effie Chamberlayne has written a story in which there is a due admixture of light and shade, of grave and gay; and the ranks of wholesome, natural, and straightforward fiction have received a recruit whose work should be heartily welcomed.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

TURKEY IN REVOLUTION

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations, 7/6 net.

This is the first book which has been published on the bloodless but far-reaching Revolution in Turkey, an event worthy of a place beside the great liberating movements of Greece and Italy, and destined to change profoundly the issues of the Near Eastern question. It contains information which can only be learnt from the lips of the actual authors of the movement. These Mr. Buxton has had a unique opportunity of knowing personally, having accompanied his brother, Mr. Noel Buxton, the chairman of the Balkan Committee, in the recent deputation to Constantinople. He describes the leading Young Turks, the Sultan, the Grand Vizier, the Sheikh-ul-Islam, and the growth, success, prospects and dangers of the new movement.

Nature Notes on the birds of the garden, their uses, wants, and ways, are added, with many interesting notes on matters connected with the garden.

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"... He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible hitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chalonere believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chalonere goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horse-shoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

'A fecund sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly tags and malrons fair!
His votaries doth Mammon there array;
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chalonere steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spang'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their exerts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chalonere to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-flying. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

LIFE AND LETTERS

We referred last week to the interesting fact that the Spectator, which, as all the world knows, is owned and edited by the great and only Mr. St. Loe Strachey, exponent of the higher journalism and bosom friend and defender of Lord Northcliffe, had lifted, or, as one might say, "pinched," an article from the columns of THE ACADEMY, entitled "In the Time of the Lilies." The delightful Mr. Strachey has not felt it consistent with his exalted dignity to vouchsafe any explanation of his curious lapse. He has neither written to us nor instructed any of his numerous henchmen to perform that service on his behalf. He appears, however, to have communicated with the author of the article, a lady who resides in a rectory near Bristol. This lady has written to us requesting to be informed when we received the manuscript of her article. She says: "I think it must be a long time since you received the MS., for I have no remembrance of sending it, and I sent it lately to the editor of the Spectator without the least idea that it had appeared elsewhere. I am extremely sorry to find that you accuse the editor of the Spectator of plagiarism. I sent the MS. to the editor under the impression that it had not previously been accepted by anybody else. I believe it is usual to conclude that MSS. are rejected when no acknowledgment whatever is made of them, and especially after a long time has passed. I should be glad if you would give me an explanation." We confess that we are quite unable adequately to cope with our fair correspondent. Her cool request for an explanation of the fact that we ventured to accept and print an article sent by her to us for publication completely knocks the wind out of us. We really have no explanation whatever to make. We will merely plead as an extenuation of our offence that we "believe that it is usual" to suppose that articles addressed to an editor with a request that they should appear in his columns are intended for publication. Of course, the whole affair is really a trifling one, and it is only the absurd and ill-mannered pomposity which Mr. Strachey saw fit on a former occasion to show towards the editor of this paper that has made it necessary to refer to the matter at all. Nobody supposes that Mr.

Strachey deliberately stole an article out of the columns of THE ACADEMY; nor is there the least occasion to doubt that he has been the unwilling victim of the talented authoress of the article with her very short memory and her complete ignorance of the usual methods of procedure in newspaper offices. But when a gentleman of the blameless unimportance of Mr. St. Loe Strachey deems it necessary to assume the airs of a provincial mayor and a sovereign pontiff rolled into one it would not be in human nature to resist the opportunity for poking a little fun at him. If Mr. Strachey were not suffering from violent symptoms of the disease which is known as "swelled head" he could have put the matter right for himself by two lines of explanation or a call on the telephone. When all is said and done, Mr. Strachey cannot deny that technically the Spectator has been guilty of a rather undignified breach of journalistic etiquette. Why, then, should he scruple to exercise towards a contemporary the ordinary amenities of decent life as they are practised between gentlemen who do not wear cocked hats? The root source of all Mr. Strachey's trouble is, obviously, that he does not read THE ACADEMY, but is "informed" by his agile underlings when THE ACADEMY says anything about the Spectator. We invite Mr. Strachey to come off his horse, which he sits with a singularly ill grace, and to do his duty by his readers. Part of that duty consists in reading the utterances of his weekly contemporaries.

The Government have duly gone through the solemn farce of introducing their Bill to disestablish and disendow the Church of England in Wales. Everyone knows that this Bill has no chance of becoming law; and the deadly, dogged dullness of Mr. Asquith's speech, with its inaccurate history and its faked figures, is a measure of the sense of hopelessness and futility with which the Liberal party goes about its sham fighting. The figures which Mr. Asquith quoted as to the relative preponderance of Churchmanship and Nonconformity in Wales are notoriously false and unreliable. On paper they work out very prettily for the Nonconformist party; but in reality they are utterly worthless. The numbers are arrived at by the process of including as members of Nonconformist bodies anybody and everybody who has ever at any time attended one of the tin conventicles where, under the guise of religion, a malignant and sour Radicalism is handed out to the "worshippers." In the case of the Church of England, the figures given represent communicants only. It is notorious that hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of people who are members of the Church of England rarely, if ever, communicate. This, of course, from the point of view of religion, is a distressing fact; but to rule out all such persons from the list of members of the Church of England is both ludicrous and dishonest. For ourselves, we state definitely that the members of the Church of England in Wales outnumber the Nonconformists by a considerable margin. There would be only one way of settling this question, and that would be by having an impartial official census instituted all over Wales. The Nonconformists have steadily declined to submit to any such census. The inference is obvious. If, as Mr. Asquith tries to make out, they outnumber Churchmen by more than two to one, what possible reason can they have for objecting to a census? The real truth is that the Church in Wales is an ever-increasing and growing force; while Nonconformity is steadily dwindling throughout that country. We need hardly say that, even if this were not the case, even if Mr. Asquith's figures were accurate figures and not garbled and faked figures, it would not make an iota of difference to the situation. Even if Mr. Asquith and his friends could prove to-morrow that Nonconformists in Wales outnumbered Churchmen in the proportion of ten to one it would give them no case for disestablishing the Church and stealing her revenues. Mr. Asquith knows this just as well as we do. Everybody knows it, and it will take a far bigger man than would be represented by Mr. Asquith and the whole of the posturing nonentities on the Liberal Front Bench rolled into one to induce the country to sanction the wholesale robbery and spoliation of its most venerable and holy institution.

Mr. Frank Harris's acquaintance with—not to say devoted friendship for—distinguished men when they are dead is quite remarkable. No sooner does any man of eminence in art, letters, politics or science escape from this wicked world than Mr. Harris comes forward with intimate personal recollections. Readers of the various publications with which Mr. Harris has been connected during the past fifteen years will not fail to remember that Mr. Harris was on terms of intimate affection with Carlyle, with Lord Randolph Churchill, with Tennyson, with Browning, and, to cut a long story short, with everybody and anybody of any importance who has died during that period. Needless to say, Mr. Swinburne has not escaped the usual personal reminiscences. In this week's Vanity Fair there is an article by Mr. Harris entitled "Swinburne: the Poet of Youth and Revolt. Memories and an Appreciation." Here is a sample of Mr. Harris's memory and appreciation: "He was not of imposing appearance: about five feet four or perhaps five in height, with sloping bottle shoulders and pigeon chest, there was a certain vigour or perkiness in his walk; his legs at least were fairly strong and carried the little podgy body briskly." A careful perusal of Mr. Harris's article leads one to the conclusion that he only once had the honour of meeting Mr. Swinburne; and it is, perhaps, needless to add that the gentleman who was responsible for bringing about the meeting between the poet and his future appreciator and biographer was Mr. Watts-Dunton. We are quite ready to admit that what Mr. Harris does not know about imposing appearances and little podgy bodies is not worth knowing. But that does not lessen our disgust at these brutal sneers at the personal appearance of a great man and a great poet. We fail to see why, because Mr. Harris has enjoyed the hospitality of the poet Swinburne, he should think it proper or decent to make insulting remarks about his personal appearance the moment the breath is out of his body. In the same number of Vanity Fair there is an article entitled "Sportsmen and Swinburne." The author of this article is evidently in a state of abysmal ignorance about the subjects of both sport and poetry. He has made the amazing discovery that "there can be no doubt that Swinburne has written far, far too much, and that there are not more than ten of his poems worth preserving." So that we have our delightful contemporary on one page making vulgar and offensive remarks about the poet's personal appearance, and on another page consigning to contemptuous oblivion the great mass of his poetical writings. From the memories and appreciations of Mr. Frank Harris and his henchmen, Good Lord deliver us.

We regret that there appears to be no doubt that Mr. John Davidson is dead. We had no personal acquaintance with Mr. Davidson, and our judgment of him is, therefore, entirely limited to our opinion of his poetical works. Readers of THE ACADEMY will not require to be reminded that our opinion of him as a poet was not an exalted one. He wrote a few good poems, but the best of his work never had any claims to be considered great poetry. His earlier work, however, was pleasing in many respects, and was free from the gross faults of taste and the wild, egotistical arrogance of his later performances. That he should have been given a pension we always considered outrageous. But having once given him a pension, it seems to us that there should be no question about continuing the small annual payment to his widow. When we say that we consider that the granting of a pension to John Davidson was an outrageous thing we should not like to be misunderstood. As far as we are concerned, we should be delighted if every writer of poetry at all above the level of mediocrity could be rewarded with a pension. But as this is manifestly impossible, in view of the miserably small amount of money which is available for the purposes of rewarding literary talent, we should be inclined to think that less harm would be done by withholding it altogether than by allocating it in notoriously wrong directions. Mr. Davidson and his friends have given it as one of the reasons which induced Mr. Davidson to take his own life that he found it impossible to live on his pension. But he was never expected to live on his pension. Other men of equal parts live and die without pensions; and that Mr. Davidson and his friends should grumble about the inadequacy of his pension savours somewhat of looking a gift-horse in the mouth. To a man of Mr. Davidson's birth, parentage and surroundings a hundred a year was a very useful addition to the income which he was enabled to earn as a journalist and man of letters.

The ladies who are so desirous of taking a hand in ruling the destinies of England and the Empire can hardly be congratulated on the brilliance of their oratory. In the "representative gathering of citizens" on Saturday last at the Aldwych Theatre Mrs. Pethick-Lawrence delivered herself of what she probably considered a phrase of remarkable aptness. "Just as the oven is to the clay, so is Holloway Prison to the Suffragettes," said this lady. This was really most unfortunate, for we have always been given to understand that clay treated in an oven became hard-baked. Mrs. Pethick-Lawrence must try again.

The readers of the New Age are being treated to a series of letters purporting to be by "Duse Mohamed," whoever he or she may be, entitled "Western Civilisation Through Eastern Spectacles." The usual flat and effete Socialistic arguments are therein exploited, dished up, it might be said, with some slight variations in the "trimmings." From this week's extraordinary epistle we cull the following paragraphs:

When one of lowly birth is accused of crime, the secret minions of the law straightway "move heaven and earth" to find evidence against him, and should they not find it, they manufacture it, for he that is accused must be convicted at any cost, for thereby lies the way to promotion; and when he is brought to the presence of the judge, the lawyers of the Crown distort the evidence against the accused beyond recognition; and when he that is accused hath the panorama of his past life spread before his eyes, the colours are so strange and startling that he is lost in amazement at his own villainy.

Of what matter if the accused be innocent? He has fallen into the clutches of the law, and verily the law is costly; therefore must the prisoner be led through the torturing and bewildering mazes of legal lore; and then is he lost, indeed! For his conviction is certain, and when he shall have served the term of his imprisonment, the detectors of crime dog his footsteps until they keep him from the paths of virtue.

Thus do the minions of the law manufacture criminals; for their office is not, as understood by them, the discovery of crime, but the making of criminals.

The "Goddess of Justice" is traditionally blind, but those who administer the law are truly devoid of sight, for they see only the shortcomings of the meek; but the transgressions of the wealthy are hid from them.

It is astonishing to find that such bewildering nonsense can get into print. We should like to know how long a "secret minion of the law" would retain his position were he to be discovered "manufacturing evidence" against an accused person; how many minutes a lawyer caught by the presiding judge "distorting evidence beyond recognition" would continue his speech before being pulled up; and how readers of the New Age can stand this sort of misrepresentation without kicking at it? Time after time the cheapest of arguments that have been discussed and refuted until we are tired of seeing them crop up in the Socialistic Press, and it is a fairly reliable indication of the mentality of the subscribers that they can still be persuaded to spend their money on such curious fare.

The same issue of the same paper contains something which is not called a poem, but which is, presumably, meant for such, as it is printed in the accepted manner of poetry. This is the effusion:

Last night a vision came to me,
I thought my lover stood by me,
And glad at heart, and gay were we,
And, O, the fields were yellow!

My lover was the world to me,
For, O, he was so kind to me,
So dear was he, so near was he,
And all the fields were yellow!

He put his arm about my waist,
His good right arm about my waist,
And slowly through the fields we paced,
The fields that were so yellow.

And on we went to Arcady,
The lovers' land of Arcady.
On, ever on and on, went we,
Across the fields so yellow.

The delicate art here shown of avoiding all worry about rhyming and eliminating all superfluous trouble will be apparent to our readers. "Me, me, we, yellow: me, me, he, yellow," and so on; the author—who appears to be a lady—is a genius, although, perhaps not precisely in the sphere she would wish to adorn. Originality, too, is cleverly shunned—what could be better than "And glad at heart, and gay were we" for striking the old, familiar note so dear to the homely-pathetic school? Go to, Messieurs who conduct the New Age—give us boldly a snipping from Herrick's songs or a stanza from Sir Philip Sidney; but do not commit again such a literary sin as to print lines like the above directly beneath an article on Swinburne.

The discovery this week of a rare volume of works printed by William Caxton, in the original binding, at an old manor-house in the north of England, is one of those heartening events which make the book-collector and the searcher for trifles in the way of literary lore among the shops in Charing Cross Road rejoice exceedingly, for it is a hint of what may yet exist unsuspected in some remote library or secluded mansion. A first edition of the "Comedies and Tragedies" of Beaumont and Fletcher, dated 1647, was also discovered close by, and the owner of these treasures was quite ignorant of their value. There is yet hope that by the unexpected unearthing of some faded letters, it may be years hence, the puzzle of the relationship of Swift and Stella, for example, will be solved, or light be thrown on one of the other famous mysteries which have bothered the critics and kept interminable controversies going.

THE RANSOMED

How have we fared my soul across the days,
Through what green valleys, confident and fleet,
Along what paths of flint with how tired feet!
Anon we knew the terror that dismays
At noonday; and when night made dark the ways
We bought delight and found remembrance sweet.
Though in our ears we heard the wide wings beat
Ever we kept dumb mouths to prayer and praise.

Yet never lost or spurned or cast aside,
And never sundered from the love of God,
Through how-so wayward intricate deceits
Lured by what shining toys our charmed feet trod,
On the swift winds we saw bright angels ride,
And strayed into the moon-made silver streets.

A. D.

THE "STAR" TURN

WE have already explained to our readers that, unlike the great Mr. Strachey, of the Spectator, we are in the habit of devoting a certain portion of our valuable time to the perusal of our weekly contemporaries. In pursuance of this habit, which we regard in the light of a duty to our readers, we have been reading the Athenæum of last Saturday. The Athenæum delights to present itself to the public eye in the figure of a journal which is devoted exclusively to high literature. Any suggestion that it was largely a publishers' trade organ, run chiefly in the interests of publishers and with a view to capturing publishers' advertisements, would no doubt be treated by the Athenæum with "silent contempt." We shall not be so rude, therefore, as to make any such suggestion, and we shall for the nonce take the Athenæum at its own valuation. An event of the utmost importance to literature has just occurred—namely, the death of the great poet, Algernon Charles Swinburne—and it was with feelings of hopeful expectancy that we turned to the columns of our high-toned contemporary in our search for its summing up of the literary situation created by the death of that poet. We were not disappointed, for on page four hundred and sixty-three of the Athenæum the magic words, "Algernon Charles Swinburne," on the top of a column met our gaze. At the foot of this article, which extended to five columns, the equally magic words "James Douglas" hit us, so to speak, right in the eye. The name James is a good name, and the name Douglas is a good name, and the collocation of these two names may truly be said to be redolent of the age of chivalry and heroic achievement. There was a certain James Douglas, whose name is blazoned on the page of Scottish history in letters of gold and scarlet. He is connected in our minds with a heart gules, winged and imperially crowned, casqued in gold, and flung by a steel-mailed heroic hand into the midst of the charging hosts of an overwhelming enemy. On the other hand, there is, as we have had occasion to point out before, a hapenny evening paper called the Star, which is more or less devoted to the dissemination of betting and racing news for the benefit of the "enslaved people." And there is also a Mr. James Douglas, a constant contributor to the aforesaid Star, and a gentleman, who, as far as we are aware, has no claim of any kind to be associated with winged hearts or chivalrous battlefields. We should not like to be misunderstood. Our remarks are not intended to reflect in any way upon the lineage or the family connections of Mr. James Douglas of the Star. We understand that Mr. James Douglas (of the Star) is an Irishman, and, as we have said before, James Douglas is a very fine name, and we should be the last to suggest that Mr. James Douglas came by his name in any other but a correct and reputable manner. We will even go the length of saying, that if Mr. James Douglas will furnish us with the history of the Irish branch of the house of Douglas we shall have much pleasure in giving it our most earnest and respectful attention. All of which foregoing may serve to clear the ground and bring us to the main facts of the astonishing situation, which are that on the occasion of the death of England's greatest poet that high and mighty organ of pure literature, the Athenæum, finds itself reduced to the sorry pass of enlisting the services of the distinguished colleague of "Captain Coe," of "Uno" and of "Starlight," whose world-renowned "finals" and "Newmarket doubles" and "extra special paddock snips" have made our Star newspaper what she is. The mere fact that Mr. James Douglas has been for many years a contributor to the Star might not, in the estimation of the unthinking, be considered anything against him, considered as the obituary writer of a great poet. We should not be disposed to agree with people who would adopt such a line of argument; for we are of opinion that in no domain more than in that of literature or journalism can the value of a man be so surely gauged by the company he keeps. But we shall not labour this point, and we shall confine ourselves to the consideration of Mr. James Douglas's article in the Athenæum on its merits and demerits. Here is what Mr. James Douglas thinks, or professes to think, of the English language:

He (Swinburne) may, without straining the analogy, be called the Wagner of poetry, for he forced our harsh and obstinate vocables to express emotions and moods and sensations which hitherto had been deemed to be beyond the powers of poetry. The language in which he wrote is as poor in melody as it is rich in colour. As a musical instrument it is immeasurably inferior to Greek, to Latin, to Italian, and even to French. . . . But the very qualities which make English prose unsurpassed are the qualities which drive the English poet into despair.

We shall take leave to say that in this short paragraph there is contained quite enough ignorance, stupidity and bumptious pretentiousness to relegate its writer once and for all to the company that he has chosen for himself. It is just the sort of thing that "Captain Coe" or "Uno" or "Starlight" might be expected to dash off after the toil and trouble of the "midday final" are at an end. Observe the analogy: "Swinburne may be called the Wagner of poetry, for he forced our harsh and obstinate vocables to express emotions and moods and sensations which hitherto had been deemed to be beyond the powers of poetry." So we may take it that Mr. James Douglas is of opinion that before the advent of Richard Wagner the subject matter of the musician's art—namely, melody, discord and concord—was in a harsh and obstinate state, which yielded for the first time to a master of music in the shape of Wagner. In other words, Mr. James Douglas is ignorant of Bach, of Handel, of Mozart and all the rest of the great composers, just as he is apparently ignorant of Shakespeare, of Chaucer, of Milton, of Keats, of Shelley and of all the rest of the great poets. And when we say that he is ignorant of them we do not mean that he has never heard of them, or never listened to them or read them, but that he has so completely misunderstood them that he labours under the dismal delusion that Wagner in the sphere of music and Swinburne in the sphere of poetry succeeded for the first time in doing what all the other great musicians and poets had failed to do, which, of course, is the sheerest balderdash and a shining example of hapenny criticism at its brightest and best. It is characteristic of hapenny criticism that its praise should invariably be dealt in terms of odious and inept comparison. Your hapenny critic is quite incapable of saying that so-and-so is a great poet and giving rational reasons for his belief. He is bound in the nature of things to say that so-and-so is the Shakespeare of the nineteenth century, or the Belgian Keats, or that while he excelled Wordsworth in technique he fell behind him in "metrical sonority," whatever that may mean. This is the sort of criticism which, applied to himself, would have driven Mr. Swinburne to invective odes. It is precisely the glory of Swinburne that he invented nothing new in poetry, and made no such idiotic and unpoetical attempt. Like all great poets, he simply continued writing poetry where the last great poet left off, using as his medium the incomparably beautiful English language, which, so far from being immeasurably inferior, as Mr. James Douglas would have us believe, to Greek, Latin, Italian, and even to French, is the equal of Greek and the superior of every other language, as the vehicle of poetry. A man who refers to our beautiful language as "harsh and obstinate vocables" writes himself down an ass in the face of all the English poets. We are entitled to ask how it comes about that the editor of the Athenæum finds himself moved to go to a hapenny betting sheet for the writer of his obituary notice of a great and glorious poet? By way of an answer we will quote from the last sentence of Mr. James Douglas's article:

More than most poets of the first order, he was fortunate in his friendships, and not least among the gifts showered upon him by the gods was the companionship and comradeship of thirty years with his housemate at the Pines, Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton, to whom the world of letters offers its sympathy in his irreparable loss.

Mr. Watts-Dunton's connection with the Athenæum is as well known, if not so much advertised, as his connection with the late Mr. Swinburne. While if we turn to the latest edition of that useful publication Who's Who, under the heading Douglas, James, journalist and critic, assistant editor and literary critic of the Star, we read: Publications: "Theodore Watts-Dunton, poet, novelist, critic. 1904," etc., etc. So that we are enabled to arrive at the conclusion that among the gifts showered upon Mr. James Douglas by the gods not the least is the privilege of having written the biography of Mr. Watts-Dunton, which Mr. James Douglas is quite astute enough to know is one of the very best things, from a worldly point of view, that he ever did in his life. One good turn deserves another. Mr. James Douglas wrote the biography of Mr. Watts-Dunton and was not "afraid to be fulsome." Mr. Watts-Dunton is not averse to flattery laid on with a trowel; and with a very large trowel indeed Mr. James Douglas liberally obliged him. And now the slow revenge of time has brought Mr. James Douglas his due reward in the shape of the honour and glory of being allowed to write a signed obituary notice of Mr. Watts-Dunton's distinguished friend. Mr. James Douglas is kind enough to offer to Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton in his "irreparable loss" the sympathy of the world of letters, and, inasmuch as he has no more claim to represent the world of letters than the next policeman has to represent the world of mathematics, we shall take the liberty of advising him in future, in default of holding his peace altogether, to speak for himself and for those he is entitled to speak for, and to leave the world of letters to look after itself. Finally, as it seems de rigueur to end up any article referring to Swinburne with an allusion to Mr. Watts-Dunton, we shall make note of the somewhat significant fact that the period of time when Swinburne went to reside at The Pines, Putney, with Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton synchronised with the period of time when he left off writing good poetry. This is a fact upon which we shall not comment, except in so far as to observe that when the gods shower gifts upon a man with one hand they are rather apt to take away other gifts with the other hand. This is a disposition on the part of the gods which we sincerely regret, but which we cannot help.

APRIL

WE cross in this month, which is so worthily dear to poets, the bridge between Spring and Summer, and in the span of its thirty days the demeanour of our little company of English travellers, could some interested onlooker note it, would be seen to undergo a pleasant change. Towards the country of opened leaf-buds, the bourne of the thick-set primroses, the flaming rhododendron, the fallen snow-petals of orchards, and the bursting calyx of the rose, we plod more merrily than we did when in chilly October we traversed that other highway that led to the dismal domains of Winter. That mighty tyrant, the East Wind, loses his keen sword-edge, and is fain to make up in strength what he lacks in sharpness; coats are unbuttoned to him in friendly fashion—we laugh at his bluff greeting, and when in good time he yields place to his gentler brothers of the south and west we are inclined to venture a song. Behind are the ice and snow and frost and fog, the grime of slushy streets, and the menace of stark, black branches rattling to the storm; in front are the warm open spaces of golden meadows in May, the fresh green veil of rustling woodlands, the shy bird-choirs of summer. No wonder is it, then, that poets small and great fall in love with the April-maiden!

The Romans, says Lemprière, consecrated the first days of April to Venus, "the goddess of beauty, the mother of love, the queen of laughter, the mistress of the graces"; the Roman widows and virgins assembled in the temple of Virile Fortune, and disclosing their personal deformities, prayed to the goddess to conceal them from their husbands. The custom of "practising jocular deceptions" on the primal day of the month, as Hone quaintly puts it, seems just as ancient, and has its counterpart among many nations; an old-time poet writes to his mistress that her charms were quite sufficient distraction for him, without the aid of fools' errands:

Thou needs't not call some fairy elf
On any April-day,
To make thy bard forget himself,
Or wander from his way.

The Saxons called April Oster or Easter-monath, and the festival of Easter, so heartening, so splendid in its associations, is most frequently celebrated within its bounds. No one who retains the faintest interest in the great world-story of Calvary could avoid a thrill on Easter morning; in its hold on our imagination it is second only to Christmas.

As might be expected, various whimsical customs used to be observed on the occasion of Easter, some of which have not yet been swamped out of existence by the flood of modernism. In the early part of the nineteenth century many good Irish people were in the habit of rising early "to see the sun dance in honour of the resurrection." Numbers of persons positively asserted that they had seen this happen on Easter morning. The origin of this peculiar superstition seems to be vague, but may perhaps be traced to the wavering reflection of the sun's image in clear water at a favourable dawn. There existed also in many English counties a curious custom of "lifting" people in a chair three times in succession at Easter-tide; parties of six or seven or more used to gather for this purpose, parade the streets, and extort from every "lifted" or "heaved" person a contribution. To what deserving end the money was devoted history sayeth not. This appears to be, according to the chronicler already quoted, "a vulgar commemoration of the resurrection which the festival celebrates." Eggs of diverse kinds, dyed and decorated, sometimes ornamented with the name of the recipient or a motto conformable to the season, have been given among friends at this period for hundreds of years, and the old custom has remained, greatly developed and varied, to the present day. A game of ball used to be played as part of the religious service in Italy, and at Bury St. Edmunds on Shrove Tuesday, Easter Monday, and Whitsuntide, "twelve old women side off for a game at trap and ball, which is kept up with the greatest spirit and vigour until sunset." Thus they made merry, at any rate, in 1825. To come to later times, London itself still retains a few of the ancient ceremonies which not many of the onlookers, it is to be feared, appreciate at their true value. In the quaint churchyard of St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield—those of our readers who have never seen this astonishing bit of old London should make a special pilgrimage thither at the earliest opportunity—on Good Friday morning certain old ladies receive doles from the authorities; formerly the offerings had to be placed on the top of a convenient tomb-stone.

It is in the country, however, and not in the town or in man's observances, that the finest enchantment of April is to be found. When Browning wrote his famous "Home-Thoughts from Abroad" he recked little of the smoke of cities or the swarm of the crowded streets:

And whoever wakes in England
Sees some morning unaware,
That the lowest boughs and the brushwood sheaf
Round the elm-tree bole are in tiny leaf,
While the chaffinch sings on the orchard bough
In England—now!

And in another poem he gives a perfect little cameo of a scene which is familiar to all, but which can never lose its charm:

Your ghost will walk, you lover of trees
(If our loves remain),
In an English lane,
By a cornfield-side a-flutter with poppies.
Hark, those two in the hazel coppice—
A boy and a girl, if the good fates please,
Making love, say—
The happier they!
Draw yourself up from the light of the moon,
And let them pass, as they will too soon,
With the bean-flower's boon,
And the blackbird's tune,
And May, and June!

We may wander the level Midland meadows through which the slow river winds, meadows spangled with a million daisies, and stand on the high lock gates listening to the quiet purl of the water past the warped timbers, watching the dusky horses as they tramp patiently the grass-grown towpath and drag into the distance a couple of lazy barges; we may linger on some grand Cornish cliff and feel the fine, salt sea-wind strong as wine, hear it swishing among the dry heather-stems at our feet, watch the brown plumes of smoke from passing vessels carried high into the firmament; we may explore some shady Devon valley on the fringe of the great moor, where the stream is foaming and laughing and ferns bend low to dip their fresh fronds in eddying pools; we may walk through the mazes of apple-blossom in some rich orchard—everywhere will be the sense of Spring, and with it the knowledge of the re-birth of sweet and inexplicable things; a longing, too, for some unknown good which seems only to come in its fulness at the opening of the year. A singer who knew much sadness has expressed this longing exquisitely:

About the wild beginning of the Spring
There came to me, and all the world, a day
To prove the Winter wholly gone away.
I said—"O day, thy lips are sweet to sing,
But surely in thy voice some sweeter thing
Than thy mere song I find: lo, now I pray,
Before thou goest, turn to me and say,
Why round thee so my heart keeps wandering?"
Then, as a man who having loved and lost,
Within his dead love's sister's child may see Something of what on earth he treasured most,
So, looking on that day, my memory
Was filled with thoughts of April days wherein Love's joy, too young for pain, did first begin.

However strongly we are drawn towards the vivid and teeming splendours of the countryside at this season, we cannot wholly disregard the town. We must be loyal to our old friends among the elms and limes and chestnut-trees hidden away in squares and terraces, unsuspected by the man who treads only the main routes—the undiscouraged ones that do so much to cheer these often gloomy corners of the city; we must not forget that ancient tree in Cheapside, whose shining emerald leaves appear so startlingly amid the sombre warehouses and the clash of traffic; Chelsea and Kensington, too, have surprising green vistas in April and May. The trees are late this month—winter was unkind, and held the land long; one old chestnut, which put forth distinguishable buds on March 5th last year, waited patiently this year for twenty more days before he warily showed a peep of green. He is now arrayed beautifully and without stint, glowing like a green flame after the showers, but his companions the elms close by have only just wakened and donned their tiny pellets of palest verdure. London brightens visibly to the call of April, and is no longer the dark, sullen city that has oppressed us through the dreary months behind. Too soon the leaves will droop, too soon the smoky air will deposit a film over their glistening grace, but for a few weeks—half of April and half of May perhaps—they are welcome to eyes that weary of brick and stone and "the work of man's hands"; they give a deeper meaning to life. "The sun burned with it," said Richard Jefferies, "the broad front of morning beamed with it; a deep feeling entered me while gazing at the sky in the azure noon, and in the starlit evening. I was sensitive to all things, to the earth under, and the star-hollow round about; to the least blade of grass, to the largest oak." His experience is not solitary—he has been over-praised; many men who work in offices and mingle with the city crowd can find in themselves that keen Nature-love which should belong to us all. We write, or we refrain; but we all hear these echoes of the returning Spring in our hearts, and, to most of us, they chime the melodies of hope and faith and love.

SWINBURNE AS A METRICIAN

Of the dead singer as a poet much has and more will be written; here he shall be considered merely as a metrical craftsman. His greatest endowment in this respect was certainly an unrivalled command over words. Not that, like Francis Thompson, he discovered or invented gorgeous language, recondite archaic phrases, but that ordinary words seemed to possess for him a fluidity which no one else found in them. When Milton, fearing textual change as impiety, weaves actual words of Scripture into his verse, his majestic strain often gasps and falters. But Swinburne could fit them unerringly to his music. One of his poems ends with the words (I place an accent-mark to show a probable dissyllable):

Therefore thy sins, which are many, are forgiven thee,
Because thou hast loved much.

Apart from context, these words have no definite metre, and one would not know how to read them; coming where they do, they seem made for the place. Another time he began a poem thus:

By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept,
Remembering thee.

All admire the result, though there is much difference of view as to how the lines should be read. Many prosodists give but four accents to the long lines, two to the shorter—e.g.:

By the wáters of Bábylon we sat dówn and wépt, Remémbering theé.

This implies making five syllables go to a "foot" in every long line, a measure never elsewhere used habitually by Swinburne (or anyone else), though single instance of it occur here and there. Others give five, or even six, feet to the long lines, but no one disputes the strength and swiftness of their movement. Yet the words are taken unaltered from the Prayer Book version of the Psalms.

While he could use polysyllables with effortless dexterity, as in hundreds of lines like:

From the bountiful infinite West, from the happy memorial places,

his mastery is even more obviously shown in the way that our harsh monosyllables—those little round bullets of words, as an Italian called them—melt and swim in the torrent of his rhythm, particularly in his trisyllabic metres. Though this was evidently a gift rather than acquirement, it was strengthened by close study of sound, and by free use of assonance and alliteration. So much is obvious on the face of his verse, but Mr. Watts-Dunton has told us that it was a method deliberately adopted from belief that only thus could our rough vocables be yoked in harmonious fellowship. Hence came the cadences that first charmed a listening public, as with

. . . lip of leaves and ripple of rain.

Perhaps alliteration has never been more deftly used than by him at his best, for instance, in this lovely stanza (where, by-the-by, "wells" is used of natural water-springs, which a recent critic in these columns thought unjustifiable):

Wells where no beam can burn
Through frondage of the fern
That hides from hart and hern
The haunt it hallows.

It need not be denied, however, that such "hunting the letter " was sometimes carried to excess. When we come on lines like:

Welling water's winsome word,
Wind in warm wan weather, we may be pardoned for thinking the thing overdone, and for remembering with a smile such old friends as:

Lo, from Lemnos lamely limping,
and:
Begot by butchers, but by bishops bred.

Moderation, indeed, was never this singer's forte. If his ear was pleased by such a rhyme as "her" and "harp-player," we are sure to have similar cadences repeated with even tiresome frequency; if he chances on such another as "sea-mew" and "deem you," we may confidently expect a succession of like rhymes in the same piece. When a thing seemed good, it was difficult for him to believe we could have too much of it.

By common consent, he is our great moulder of metres. Yet it would be interesting to compare him in this respect with Browning, and see which has given us the larger number of new forms. This is not the time or place to compare these two poets otherwise, but the variety as well as roughness of Browning's metrifaction has perhaps hardly received due notice. While the younger singer is infinitely more melodious, and while he gave us many new creations, such as the wonderful "Chorus of Birds," translated from Aristophanes—while, also, he was conspicuously fond, especially in later days, of long lines, and manifestly revelled in the exercise of his astonishing power over these—it might be possible to argue that his highest success lay less in the skill with which he invented new metres than in the vigour and freshness which he imparted to old ones. Wonderful new music was breathed into hackneyed tunes; all the resources of art, as well as a poet's fire and fervour, enhance the effect. To many this will seem a feat even more remarkable than the invention of new measures; nowhere is the master's hand more clearly perceived than when it wakens worn strings to fresh life.

From another point of view it is interesting to compare him metrically with a writer whose work he greatly admired, and who equally admired his work—Christina Rossetti. There is something exotic, not purely English, in the cadences of both Christina and her brother. English by birth and education, they were wholly Italian in blood, and lent strange movements to English rhythms. Unaccented syllables seem more real to them than to us, and do more duty than we are accustomed to expect from them. In Christina's verse the words sometimes seem hardly wedded to the rhythm; they wander from it in distracting though exquisite irresponsibility. Swinburne's cadences are far more definite. There is no doubting them, no escaping from them; they hold us in willing thrall, bear us unresistingly along. The fiery flow of his verse brooks no pause, no uncertainty; his syllable-accent is unmistakable, while hers are often vague. Comparison need not involve disparagement; gifts are various, and praise of one artist does not imply depreciation of another. There is a well-marked difference in their methods; lovers of verse will notice it.

Time would fail to tell, and perhaps few would have patience to hear told, the various devices employed by this most accomplished of craftsmen to give point to his verse. Never, surely, was such virtuosity allied to such native fire, just as seldom have such critical faculties been combined with poetical imagination. Tennyson said that Swinburne, in youth, was "a reed through which all things blew into music." The saying is often quoted as one of sheer praise, even as a definition of what a poet should be. It can hardly have been so intended. The late Laureate's encomiums were not usually ungrudging, nor was a poet's personality conceived of by him as quite the passive entity this metaphor implies. To make the metaphor just, we must add a player to the pipe, one who could finger all its stops with self-conscious if admirable skill. Catholic as Swinburne was in praise of good work, the "wood-notes wild" of Burns, or the untutored verse of Emily Brontë, equally with the large utterance of an Æschylus or a Milton, his own bent was always in one direction. Even when he wrote verse of archaic rudeness like "Queen Bersabé," of archaic simplicity like "The King's Daughter," it is always the skilled artist rejoicing in his powers, "curbing his liberal hand" with conscious artifice. His interest in metrical study never faltered. Though he despised technical prosody—which is hardly wonderful when one thinks what he must have often been offered by way of it—he was an unwearied critic and practitioner of all that it ought to cover. To the end this remained true. "The Duke of Gandia" shows the artist, whether or no it shows very much of the true poet. The prodigality of that "metrical invention" [this does not necessarily mean devising wholly new metres] for which Tennyson "envied" him remained unexhausted; if effects were repeated, it was of deliberate choice, not because others were wanting.

It is too soon yet to adjudge Swinburne's final place even as a metrical, let alone as a poet. Our older critics have all been reared under his potent spell. Reaction is inevitable, for depreciation always succeeds adulation. What has befallen Tennyson and Browning will befall him also. Criticism will not improbably fasten on what is most obviously vulnerable in his verse—its efflux of words, its artifices of style, the heavy perfume that exudes from his flowers.

A month or twain to feed on honeycomb
Is pleasant, but one tires of scented rhyme—

if one may so alter his own words. To read a single page of Swinburne is to be filled with amazement at the splendour of his utterance. Every metrical effect that one has noticed elsewhere, with others hitherto undreamed of, seems pressed into the service. The ear is deafened by reverberation, dizzied by sound. As page is added to page, the unceasing strain continues, till even a willing reader may grow weary. As with Francis Thompson, though in a different way, one longs that he would for a space be less laborious, would sometimes deviate into naturalness. Metrical art is consummate, but the highest of all arts is to conceal the fact of art, to seem divinely simple and inevitable. Rarely is this highest perfection attained. And a suspicion may obtrude itself that the iridescent glitter of hurrying words is reflected from shallows rather than depths of thought. But when the Devil's Advocate has done his worst, there will still remain an imperishable residue. Not in vain have those great powers, that lifelong devotion, been consecrated to his art; not in vain was the gift of melody breathed upon his lips. When his frenzies of love and hate cease to interest, students will still ponder over his lines, analyse their structure, seek to recapture the secret of their melody. If not in "the general heart of man," yet assuredly in the scholar's estimation, his poems will "reside." For all his passionate democracy, he was intellectually an aristocrat, and by his fellows he will be cherished. It is impossible to conceive that his marvellous métrique should ever cease to deserve study; it may well be that posterity will regard him as the most accomplished musician that ever handled an English lyre.

EARLY LATIN HYMNS

Early Christian Hymns. Translated by DANIEL JOSEPH DONAHOE. Werner Laurie, 6s. net.

MR. DONAHOE has composed some hundred and sixty versions of Latin hymns, classified under the names of twenty-seven authors, ranging in date from St. Hilary, of the fourth century, to Pope Urban the Eighth, who died in 1644. He also includes some versions of anonymous hymns, a few of which are as late as the pontificate of Pius the Seventh, who died in 1824. Short biographical notices of the authors give the hymns additional interest, and are quite adequate for that purpose. The information which they offer is, however, rather too positively stated. The authorship of a large number of the best-known hymns is much disputed. Concerning Jesu dulcis memoria, for instance, the most that should be affirmed is that it is still held to be St. Bernard's by many hymnologists. Concerning King Robert of France, it is unnecessary to insist that he is erroneously called "the second," for it is a mere question of reckoning, but of the five or six hymns very doubtfully ascribed to him, Veni Sancte Spiritus, the one chosen to represent him by Mr. Donahoe, is one of the two most unlikely to be his; Notker is the most probable author. It is also quite uncertain that Elpis, the only female hymnographer named, was the second wife of Boetius; his only wife known for certain was Rusticiana, daughter of Symmachus, and a different woman. Mr. Donahoe might also have ascribed to Elpis her other hymn, Beate Pastor Petre clemens accipe, since it is to be found still in the Roman Breviary in a less scattered condition than the one he translates. The use of Mr. Donahoe's classification here must not therefore be taken as corroborative, but merely as indicative, the sense in which he chiefly uses it.

"Early Latin Hymns" would be a more accurate title of this collection, for there are no versions from the Greek. It is a pity that Mr. Donahoe has not been able to print the original Latin, especially of some twenty examples which are not to be found in the Roman Breviary or Missal, generally the most accessible places of reference. He tells us that his version of the prayer of Eugenius, who died Archbishop of Toledo in 657, is the first to be printed. It is probably the only one in the volume of which this can be stated. The English hexameters in which he represents it are fairly successful until towards the end; indeed, his versions are generally meritorious, though some of them tend to colourlessness, relapsing at times into prose and occasionally into faulty rhymes. Such rhymes as "tower" with "pour," "grace" with "blessedness," "bring them" with "kingdom," are inadmissible, but they do not occur very often. Mr. Donahoe also cannot manage with dignity all the metres which he attempts, and St. Damasus's hymn, Martyris ecce dies Agathae, probably not a very good specimen originally, becomes trivial and rather silly in the English version. On the other hand, Mr. Donahoe shows a just appreciation of the lyric possibilities of Fitzgerald's quatrains and adopts their form in many of his versions. This has seldom been tried by hymn writers, perhaps because the adaptability of the quatrains to music is doubtful. A few quatrains from the Rhythm of St. Thomas, Adoro Te devote latens Deitas, indicate fairly the measure of Mr. Donahoe's success:

Upon the Cross was Thy divinity
Concealed, nor here Thy human form we see,
Yet I, in faith confessing, seek Thee, Lord,
Like the repentant thief upon the tree.

I do not ask, as Thomas did, dear Lord,
To see Thy wounds; sufficient is Thy word;
Oh, fill my soul with firmer faith, that still
In hope and love for Thee it may accord.

* * *

Jesus, whom here in figures I behold,
I hunger for the time to see unrolled
The veil from Thy sweet features; let me be Blest with the vision in Thy halls of gold.

The Rhythm is, of course, a personal and was never a liturgical hymn. It is to be found at the beginning of Roman Missals, among the private prayers for the use of priests after saying Mass. It is impossible to combine the poetry and close reasoning of this fine dogmatic poem in our vaguer English, but Mr. Donahoe's version compares favourably with its most popular English form, the timid rendering of two or three verses by the compilers of "Hymns Ancient and Modern," though it is about the best example of their co-operative muse. The compilers wisely conceal the author's name, for their version is probably welcome to thousands who know nothing about him, and would certainly not wish to hear more. In two cases Mr. Donahoe shows his enterprise by seeking difficulties which the original Latin does not actually impose upon him. St. Gregory's two hymns, Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes, and Ecce jam noctis tenuatur umbra, to be found in the dominical Matins and Lauds for the summer quarter, are in sapphics, naturally of the Latin type, as they were written with comparatively very few exceptions by Catullus, Ovid and Ausonius, and, probably without any exception, by the hymnographers. Mr. Donahoe renders them, with a fair ear for rhythm, into sapphics of Sappho's type, the type which the consummate lyrist who is now more than ever her immortal interpreter used in "Anactoria."

Rise we, now, ere dawn, and begin our watching,
Lift our hearts in psalms, and in meditation;
And with voices tuned to the Lord, in music
Sing His sweet anthems.

* * *

Be Thy mercy shown to our feeble nature,
Sin and shame and woe from our bosoms banish;
Everlasting peace, in Thy halls of splendour,
Grant us, O Saviour.

These verses, one from each hymn, are not quite Mr. Donahoe's best rhythmically, but in the best verse he has not had sufficient art to avoid rhyme, which is out of place. Though they will not satisfy Mr. T. S. Omond's rules of quantity, and cannot be expected to reach Swinburne's exquisite sense of its balance, they give far more idea of the rhythm of Sappho than the body of English sapphics by other writers.

Mr. Donahoe's love of the great Latin hymns has placed him in a perilous position. He follows on a path not only much worn, but traced with exquisite skill. It is impossible for him to avoid comparison with his predecessors. Like all lovers of originals, perhaps he does not quite realise the value of two of their interpreters who have gone before him. The skill and taste of John Mason Neale in expressing in English the thoughts of the great hymnographers, both Greek and Latin, is of so high an order as to amount to true poetic genius. As regards the Latin hymnographers he is equalled by Edward Caswall. Quite apart from comparative biography, Neale's hymns in particular suggest a soul of singularly winning, poetic beauty, consonant

With those just spirits that near victorious palms,
Hymns devout and holy psalms,
Singing everlastingly:

and in strong contrast with the fierce seraph who sung those lines. His heights Neale was, of course, quite incapable of even setting out to approach. Yet the artistic sincerity of these two English interpreters, Neale and Caswall, did enable them to renew in their degree the song of such high hymnographers as Adam of St. Victor, St. Ambrose, St. Gregory, St. Bernard, St. Thomas, Fortunatus, Notker, Hermann, Thomas of Celano and Jacopone da Tode, and to pierce it with a new inspiration, at a period when it was dead to the vast majority of Englishmen, scarcely then relieved of Brady and Tate, still convulsed by Dr. Watts or nauseated by Toplady.

It is not surprising, if truth compels the criticism, that Mr. Donahoe has nothing to offer comparable with Neale's "Jesus, the very thought is sweet," a fragment of Jesu dulcis memoria; with "Blessed city heavenly Salem," the anonymous, Caelestis urbs Jerusalem; with "The Royal banners forward go," Fortunatus's Vexilla Regis prodeunt; with "Oh! what their joy and their glory must be," Abelard's O quanta qualia sunt illa sabbata; and with very many more: nor yet with Caswall's "At the Cross her station keeping," Jacopone da Tode's Stabat mater dolorosa; with "Come, Thou Holy Spirit, come," Veni Sancte Spiritus; with "Praise, O Sion, thy Salvation," St. Thomas's Lauda Sion Salvatorem; nor yet, again, even with the quiet dignity which distinguishes Bishop Cousins's "Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire," St. Gregory's Veni Creator Spiritus, the only liturgical hymn retained in "The Book of Common Prayer." These hymns are all represented by Mr. Donahoe. Outside his scope, quotations from Neale and Caswall may be admissible here to justify more fully the pre-eminence assigned to them. An idea of the beauty of Neale's version of Jerusalem luminosa can be given by isolated stanzas:

Light's abode, celestial Salem,
Vision whence true peace doth spring,
Brighter than the heart can fancy,
Mansion of the Highest King;
Oh, how glorious are the praises
Which of Thee the prophets sing!

There for ever and for ever
Alleluia is out-pour'd;
For unending, for unbroken
Is the feast-day of the Lord;
All is pure and all is holy
That within Thy walls is stored.

* * *

Oh, how glorious and resplendent,
Fragile body, shalt thou be,
When endued with so much beauty,
Full of health, and strong, and free,
Full of vigour, full of pleasure
That shall last eternally!

This hymn is chosen here rather than a quotation from Neale's version of the Rhythm of Bernard of Morlaix, because it is a hymnal rendering of a hymn proper, and not a little excerpt from a vast poem. The example from Caswall must be quoted entire:

The sun is sinking fast,
The daylight dies;
Let love awake, and pay
Her evening sacrifice.

As Christ upon the Cross
His Head inclined,
And to His Father's hands
His parting Soul resign'd:

So now herself my soul
Would wholly give Into His sacred charge,
In Whom all spirits live;

So now beneath His eye
Would calmly rest,
Without a wish or thought
Abiding in the breast,

Save that His Will be done
Whate'er betide;
Dead to herself, and dead
In Him to all beside.

Thus would I live; yet now
Not I, but He
In all His power and love
Henceforth alive in me.

One Sacred Trinity!
One Lord Divine!
May I be ever His!
And He for ever mine!

This intimate little lyric has no liturgical quality whatever; it sounds as might the sigh of a soul. If the line Sol praeceps rapitur, proxima nox adest, which Caswall offered as the first of a Latin poem which he had translated and no one else ever saw, was not written by himself, the lost Latin hymn must have been a very late one.

Hitherto this notice has been occupied with hymns pleasant. Two hymns must be named as the most conspicuous examples of a very small number of the modern English hymns which are also pleasant: the late Bishop Christopher Wordsworth's "Hark the sound of holy voices, chanting at the crystal sea," and still more emphatically Mr. Matthew Bridges's "Crown him with many crowns," which the late Sir George Elvey's music helped by its remarkable consonance with the words to approximate to the great Latin hymns, by its dignity, its liturgical quality, and its wide appeal, closer than any other purely modern hymn.

As regards the English texts quoted here, outside Mr. Donahoe's collection, it must be stated that they are chiefly quoted for convenience from "Hymns Ancient and Modern," and may, consequently, be garbled. After "The Hymnal Noted," first published in 1852, probably no collection contained fewer hymns unpleasant than the first "Appendix" to "Hymns Ancient and Modern," published in 1868. Since that date the now swollen volume is said to have become the most "going concern" in hymnology. Its reams of new doggerel and insipid jingle may be left as the perennial butt of writers in the Church papers. It is largely responsible for the debasement of the English hymnal, partly by its supplying novelties at any cost, and partly by its theatrical notes of expression, encouraging the performance of imitative tricks on the organ, and in the hands of tasteless organists transforming the quires of churches into theatres of natural noises like monkey-houses in a thunderstorm. Its proprietors seem to have lost all regard for the essence of hymnography if they can only provide the wives of incumbents with a new hymn for every mothers' meeting. Their contributors, as pious as could be desired, are, or have been, if they are dead, devoid of that natural taste which inspired Neale and Caswall, and only too ready, so long as they can turn out something "taking," to follow the advice:

If you can't get in at the pearly gate
Climb over the garden wall.

In justice it must be added that "Hymns Ancient and Modern" merely emphasises the downward tendency, its debasement is exceeded by such compilations as the Oratory hymn book, with less excuse.

THE INWARD LIGHT

The Sense of the Infinite. By OSCAR KUHN. (New York: Henry Holt and Co.; England, George Bell and Sons.)

IN the minds of most of us lingers a consciousness that the five bodily senses form but a small part of our equipment for the true valuation of life—that we possess some intensive power, some delicate, indefinable receptivity, by which the soul can occasionally see and hear evidences of a universe more important than this little “lukewarm bullet” on which we are all spinning away towards the unknown—more important even than the splendid constellations and shining star-clusters that swing on their immeasurable paths all round us, their nearest suns plunged in appalling deeps of space. This secret quality of man's soul, by the aid of which he reaches out to the infinite, has from the earliest times led him into labyrinthine speculations, and those who by study and solitude devoted themselves to the endeavour to raise, it may be ever so slightly, the veil between the earthbound spirit and that unseen world whence it sprang, whither they felt it must return, have been known as mystics, and in olden days their fervours were generally associated with some religious order—or disorder. As a matter of plain fact, however, we are all mystics. We all, if we have ever for five consecutive minutes pondered on our condition and our surroundings, or gazed with any intelligence on earth and sea and sky, have striven to climb “the world's great altar-stairs that slope through darkness up to God”; we have realised with irresistible certainty that things are not always what they seem. The miracle of the opening leaf-buds moves us strangely; the eternal restlessness of the calmest ocean holds us fascinated; the shy song of a hidden bird, the elemental harmonies of the wind, alike thrill us with strange emotions, with unutterable longings to discover why we are here and whither we are bound, to find the meaning of it all. It is the old story of the Norsemen gathered in their hall, and the sparrow that flew into the warmth and light for a moment, then vanished to the stormy dark—“So seems to me the life of man, O King.” Here, at the very outset of our quest, we are baffled, though it may well be that an angel has troubled the waters.

To explain in some degree this super-sense of the human soul, and to trace briefly the manner in which it has affected communities through individuals, is the object of this little book. To set forth such things in comprehensible language is a very difficult task—it amounts to an attempt to express the inexpressible; but, as finely as it may be done, we have it here in the first few chapters and the last. The fundamental idea is excellently emphasised that the vision depends on the man and his desire. “The sight of rivers and plains, flowers and trees, may give us pleasure, and yet have nothing mystical in it. . . . The world in which these mystic gleams visit us must be a purified and altruistic one.” The two chapters headed “The Transcendental View of Nature” and “Romantic Love and the Transcendental Sense” will be found most interesting to those who are desirous of reading in admirably clear sentences of the “thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.” We give a short extract from an introductory page:

There are different degrees of the transcendental experience; some vague, evanescent, passing away and leaving but little effect behind other than that of a pleasant dream. There come flashes, probably to every man in the course of his lifetime; it may be in reading poetry, or listening to a sermon, or walking over the fields or through the woods. “One look at the face of heaven and earth,” says Emerson, “lays all petulance at rest and soothes us to a wiser conviction”; and, again, “we know that the secret of the world is profound; but who or what shall be our interpreter, we know not. A mountain ramble, a new style of face, a new poem, may put the key into our hands.” Many and varied are these openings into the infinite; birth and death—the coming into the world from the unknown, the flitting across the lighted chamber of life, and the passing out once more into the unknown beyond—how can they help filling us with the sense of the infinite mystery by which we are surrounded?

The author quotes the immortal words of William Blake: “What, it will be questioned, when the sun rises do you not see a round disc of fire, something like a guinea? Oh, no, no! I see an innumerable company of the heavenly host crying ‘Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord God Almighty.’” There, it seems to us, the whole matter is summed up gloriously. There was the piercing vision of the poet; there was the spirit that could almost answer that tremendous demand of Zophar—the practical man—when reasoning with Job: “Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection? It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know?”

To these chapters we must add the last, “The Transcendental Element and Modern Life,” an acute presentation of the relation of mysticism to the life of cities and the men of to-day. We find a scientist like Professor William James of Harvard, as illustrious in the realm of psychology as his brother is in the world of fiction, declares definitely with regard to a certain experience:

One conclusion was forced upon my mind at that time, and my impression of its truth has ever since remained unshaken. It is that our normal waking consciousness, rational consciousness, as we call it, is but one special type of consciousness, whilst all about it, parted from it by the filmiest of screens, there lie potential forms of consciousness entirely different. . . . No account of the universe can be final which leaves those other forms of consciousness quite disregarded.

To discredit this kind of grave statement from level-headed modern men—and Professor James is not the only one who has touched hands with angels in the gloom—is to reduce ourselves to the most barren ways of arid materialism, to shut our eyes wilfully and say that things do not exist since we cannot see them. The mystical side of the universe will yield only to the eye of faith and hope, and such faith and hope lead us from the physical to the intellectual and spiritual plane by natural transitions. To the man who has faith argument becomes of little avail, and all this talk of mysticism and romanticism, quietism and pietism, resolves itself finally into the longing of the soul for the infinite, unknowable God, its home and its eternal rest. “What shall I more say?” asked St. Paul, recounting the names of certain ancient mystics “who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens.” And again—Paul being one of the finest mystics himself, and a clever reasoner withal—“we are saved,” he cries, “by hope.”

THE ARTS AND CRAFTS OF VENERY

The Art of Hunting; or, Three Hunting MSS. A revised edition of the Art of Hunting by WILLIAM TWICE, Huntsman to King Edward the Second. By H. DRYDEN. (1844.) The Craft of Venery: A Translation of La Chasse du Cerf. Edited by MISS DRYDEN. Illustrated from MSS., etc. (Printed by William Mark, 1908, 15s. net.)

AMONG the amateurs of the antiquities of sport the late Sir Henry Dryden held a deservedly high place.

His position has been adequately recognised by Mr. Baillie Grohman, who writes of him that his "notes are really the first sound and scholarly remarks on old English hunting we have; his predecessor Strutt's attempt being very faulty and totally inadequate." Sir Henry in the last years of his life intended to issue a new and corrected edition of his treatise, but this, unfortunately, he never carried out.

For all practical purposes the present reprint of Sir Henry's edition of the "Art of Hunting" is a new book, for it includes, besides some corrections left by him in manuscript, many additional notes; while a valuable bibliography has been added by Miss Dryden, and a translation of "La Chasse du Cerf," the oldest French treatise on hunting, is here printed for the first time.

Even without the present additions a mere reprint of the "Art of Hunting" would have been of great value, especially as the earlier editions were so limited. The first editions hardly had a public existence at all. The French tract was printed for the first time from the MS. in the possession of Sir Thomas Phillips, at the Middle Hill Press in 1840, by Sir Henry. Mr. Baillie Grohman, in Miss Dryden's introduction, records that only twenty-five copies were printed, "as well as Sir Henry remembered." Sir Henry himself set up the type for the first page. The result was four small quarto leaves, without any notes. In 1844 he published a small quarto, with translation and notes, of which only forty-one copies have been traced—the inference being that there were few besides.

His introduction to this edition, of which we quote the conclusion, is delightful, with its old-fashioned flavour and genuine enthusiasm for his subject:

And although Maister William Twici (footing it as he certainly did) would ill supply the place of George Davis at the sterno of Her Majesty's buck hounds; though he might, if now alive, crane at the raspers in the Vale of Aylesbury; and might not top a Northamptonshire five-bar with the alacrity of the Squire in the palmey days of the Pythchley; though his harriers might not equal in pace those of the Blackmoor Vale, nor his hart-hounds sweep over the open to the tune of sixteen miles an hour; let us not think too lightly of his craft of venery. Twici it is true had time to blow "trout trouourout" sundry times, to warn the gentlefolks that the hart was unharboured, and leisurely reheated on his hounds when running a burning scent; while Hugo Meynell, "the Father of fox-hunting" had scarce time to blow one "moot" to tell a Leicestershire field that a Coplew fox had broken, as he rattled out of cover at the sterno of his gallant pack. Though so wide the difference of the ancient and modern days, so fast the present, and so slow the past, let us not despise this noble science in its infancy. It was the origin of a more polished school in a more enlightened age, and who shall declare that the horn of Twici was not sweeter than Joe Maiden's, and the music of his deep-flewed hounds more melodious than the notes of their posterity?

Of Twici himself, the King's huntsman, whose name, after the fashion of the time, has many variants, very little is known, though a few new facts have been gathered by the present editor. His wages in 1322—to be paid to the Sheriff of Lancashire, to which county he was going "to take the fat venison of the present season"—were 7½d. per day, with 2d. for each ventrer and berner, and 1d. for the page, and ½d. for each greyhound, staghound, as long as they remain in the bailliewick. In 1325-6 he received 9d.; and finally he retired to Reading Abbey, possibly as a pensioner of the King, for a Close Roll entry, of March 13th, 1327-8, states that a certain Alan de Leek is sent to the Abbot and Convent of "Redinge" to receive such maintenance as William Twici had had in the Abbey. Alan de Leek, like Twici, had been a King's huntsman.

"The Art of Hunting," written in or before 1328, contains much curious information. Twici teaches us next to nothing about the most efficient way of taking the beast pursued, but much as to the proper and punctilious procedure to be followed in different cases. He begins with the hare, because it is the "most marvellous beast which is on this earth":

I will teach all those who wish to learn Hunting as I also have learnt before these hours. Now we will begin with the Hare. And why, Sir, will you begin with the Hare, rather than with any other beast? I will tell you. Because she is the most marvellous beast which is on this earth. It carries grease, and it croteys, and gnaws, and these (things) no beast in this earth does, except it. And at one time it is male, and at another time it is female. And on that account in hunting it, a man cannot blow a menee on the horn for it, as one does for other beasts, as for the Hart and for the Boar, and for the Wolf, and if it was always male, as it is at one time male, and another time female, a man could blow a menee for it, as for other beasts.

Twici, in common with many of his contemporaries, believed in the curious tradition of the alternating sex of the hare, and he cannot decide the problem as to what flourish of the horn is to be blown in connection with it!

We are then introduced to the chief hunting terms in vogue, and a dissertation on the correct method of describing harts by their "heads," the horn blasts appropriate to each animal and occasion, the proper terms to be used when addressing hounds, the manner in which harts and boars should be "undone," and, lastly, a few terms for beasts in companies—a guide in nomenclature for the historical novelist.

Following the "Art of Hunting," we have a translation of "La Chasse du Cerf," the oldest French treatise on hunting, composed about the middle of the thirteenth century, corrected from Sir Henry Dryden's manuscript, and "The Craft of Venery," from a MS. version about 1450, of a translation of Twici, with additions.

There are also interesting chapters on costume, on horns and hunting music, and upon sepulchral monuments in hunting costume and with horns, or with bows and arrows. Metal horns, we are told, are of comparatively recent date. "Down to the middle of the 17th century nearly all hunting horns were really formed from those of animals, and . . . some by means of a stopper were made to answer the purpose of drinking and hunting horns."

One misprint should be noted. In the "Bibliography" it is stated of the Sporting Magazine, or monthly calendar of the Turf, "that that serial commenced in 1792 and continued till 1780," a thing only possible in the time machine of Mr. H. G. Wells.

The book, in conclusion, is to be recommended to all amateurs of sport, and to all those interested in what Mallory, in his "King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table," calls "the goodly terms that gentle men have and use, and shall unto the world's end: that thereby in a manner all men of worship may discover a gentle man from a yeoman, and a yeoman from a villen."

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Green Curve. By "OLE LUK-OIE." (Blackwood, 6s.)

THIS collection of short stories deals almost entirely with soldiers and times of war, and is well worth the attention of connoisseurs of this style of fiction. There is none of Mr. Kipling's extravagant language, but at the same time some of the sketches may fairly be called "strong"; in this they are simply true to life, for the average private soldier is not amenable to bit and bridle in the matter of speech, nor has he in days of stress any particular regard for the niceties of life.

He rarely gets a chance to sample them, as a matter of fact. One little story, however, of the sudden joy in a camp caused by the appearance of a fresh young officer, who had succeeded in smuggling a few bottles of champagne up from the coast, is quite on the humorous side of things; and a hypothetical account of an incident arising from a war in England is amusing without being sensational. On the whole, the author was justified, we think, in preserving these stories in book form.

Render Unto Cæsar. By MRS. VERE CAMPBELL.
(Mills and Boon, 6s.)

THE predominating idea which a stranger to earth and earth's civilised ways—a Martian visitor, for example—would gather from this rather striking story would be that women are a horrible nuisance when they stir by ever so little from their own immediate concerns. The ladies of whom we read here, whether they be dark or fair, amorous or cool, exercise on the affairs of men an influence that some feminine readers will probably envy. Gregory Champion, the head of a big financial house, is attracted by Delia Ancram; her husband, Maurice, strives against his passion for Gregory's wife; so far we have just the usual hide-and-seek plot of the average novelist. But Meredith Champion, a lax and drifting character, who by no means lives up to his proud name, is under the spell of two women at once, and comes to a bad end, and the only man of any importance who seems unperturbed by his distracting environment is Mr. Lupus, Champion's chief clerk. The story is sad in its general development, but not unpleasant; clever without any attempt at "smart" writing; and, in the main, events move naturally to their climax. In the scene between Maurice Ancram and Champion the author touches a high level of dramatic dialogue.

We may remark, in closing, that young Meredith Champion, who posed as a literary person, took as the first line of a poem:

The light fell aslant through the shrouded panes.

But he called that poem a sonnet, which goes to show that either he or his creator needed a little instruction as to the nature of the accepted form of sonnet-line. Also, the use of contractions, such as "they'd," or "he'd" etc., in the relation of the story, spoils sentences otherwise impeccable, and irritates many reviewers unnecessarily.

Woman's Looking-glass. By CONSTANCE EVAN JONES.
(Nisbet, 6s.)

THE story of unfulfilled longing, such as the author sets before us in this book, must inevitably be saddening, and nothing of the sadness is abated in this instance by the manner of its presentation. Margaret Darcy, the spinster whose chronicle, according to the sub-title, this professes to be, is dependent upon a grim guardian of an aunt for her living, and in the depressing shadow of that hypochondriac she exists—she can hardly be said to live—until she is considerably over thirty, never travelling, never moving from London, never even visiting a place of amusement or the parks in the flush of springtime; she is to all intents and purposes a slave. At last a young, reserved doctor takes up his residence in the house as physician-in-ordinary to the egregious invalid, and to him, the only man she has ever met beyond the household servants, Margaret gives her aching heart. He has his suspicions of her rash feelings for him, but, as the author cynically observes, men seek youth and freshness in woman, not the faded gifts of a pale recluse, whose bloom is long past. He advises a trip to Cornwall for the aunt, and thus Margaret, who accompanies her, has a first glimpse at the world; he takes her once to the theatre, and she is lifted into a sphere of which she had never before dreamed. The aunt dies, leaving no will, and Margaret, as nearest relation, finds herself wealthy, free, and sought after by those who previously would hardly have looked at her. The doctor, who, we must say, was a bit of a cad, finds her attentions irksome—she has sent him flowers and fruit when he was ill, and worried about him in those delicate ways which a loving woman has at her fingers' ends—and he tells her definitely that he is engaged to be married, showing her the photograph of her unknown rival—a sweet, attractive young girl. So the story closes, with the woman's heart near to breaking.

Despite its sombreness and its quality of cynicism, the author has made the account of frustrated love very telling and poignant. There are other characters, too, whom we have no space to mention in a brief review, who supply a note of relief which if not precisely humorous is still in a much lighter mood than the principal theme. The only complaint we can make is that the comments are unnecessarily bitter at times and a great deal too indiscriminate. It is a warped judgment and a distorted outlook which can conclude the book with these stinging paragraphs:

Illogical women set their affections not on things above, but on man beneath, who is of the earth very earthly, and become bruised reeds in consequence. They cannot understand that though man wants but little here below he wants that little good—the best in fact. He wants a young, fresh, beautiful wife whom other men will envy him. He likes to be envied. A woman is capable of worshipping a battered creature who has lost everything in the battle of life; not so man. And that is where the sex question begins and ends.

"Love will beget love" is many women's motto; they fancy that it will beget marriage also, but it won't. Man is only man after all—very narrow, very bigoted, rather selfish, very vain. He marries to gratify his vanity, and presently develops into that admirable institution, the British husband—a man of meals and uxorious moments, who appreciates the fact that his wife has more complexion than brains. A man who loses his figure and his imagination, but who goes, we hope, to heaven when he dies.

The author has been gazing through a curiously unreliable glass if she really believes this. The British husband, taking him at the average, is a fine fellow and chivalrous to boot, and his wife knows it if she has any sense. To make an exception take the place of a rule is, however, the well-tried method of novelists. Where, otherwise, would be their plots!

THE DREAMER

THE fairest and sweetest things in the world are not always those which can be touched or tasted, seen or heard. To many men the tangible, visible, audible pleasures and phenomena of life are but the glass through which they perceive mighty forces at work without ceasing, by the aid of which they are enabled to hold implicitly thoughts that, like some magic master-key, will unlock and set ajar the gates of an unexplored land. They have often, in the roaring city streets, in the broad and fragrant fields, in the silent hour at the fireside, in the close enfolding of great winds, the feeling that they are surrounded by truths which ever evade their grasp but may not be disregarded. It is no vague ecstasy of a disordered brain, no treacherous transportation of the soul, which thus comes to these dreamers—as the stolid scorners sometimes call them—but a veritable sober experience that leaves its effects on their daily existence, an experience of irresistible intuition, for want of a better word, that is as rational and defensible as the routine of their office or the morning meal. The dreamer from all time has also been the doer, if not actually then vicariously, by his inspiration of others; and it must not be imagined that he is invariably a noted figure in history, or that he always stands on a higher plane than his fellow-men in matters of fame and fortune. He walks the streets side by side with us every day, habited as his compatriots; but he sees a little more as he walks. He finds in the mountain of purple cloud that forebodes a thunder-storm something that makes his heart beat faster; he views the city under a sudden delight of snow, and is thrilled; he hears in the continuous undertone of London a note speeding upward to take its part in some tremendous, distant harmony. His spiritual faculty is deepened, though he would be hard put to it if pressed to cage his feelings in language. In the streets, he will be still seeing the vision beautiful:

Still nursing the unconquerable hope,
Still clutching the inviolable shade,
With a free onward impulse brushing through,
By night, the silver'd branches of the glade—
Far on the forest skirts, where none pursue
On some mild pastoral slope
Emerge, and resting on the moonlit pales,
Freshen his flowers, as in former years,
With dew, or listen with enchanted ears,
From the dark dingles, to the nightingales.

Faith is for him, hope is for him, and charity—for those that sit in the seat of the scornful.

But suppose, say these latter conscientious ones, this visionary of yours crosses the street in his bemused, happy fashion, and is run over? Does he not then come into somewhat gross contact with those harder and sterner facts which he passes by so airily, and is not this contact calculated to project some of the dreams out of him? What if he dies?

If he dies? O modern riders of Curtius, who leap so easily on your hard-mouthed steed Practicality into the gulf of Misconception, if he dies more dreams will have greeted him than you ever in your most exalted moments imagined possible. And if he is only maimed (so we know from experience) his life of the spirit is so intensified that pain, whose veiled face was till then thought scarred and seared and stern, is suddenly unveiled as a calm, contradictory friend: a little curious, a little cruel, maybe, but, above all, a friend. So that the dreamer has within him a kind of eternal life, at the present time. In what dim valleys of primeval dawn it first sprang to view he cannot tell; to what broad, bright, invisible sea it ultimately flows he is unaware; more often than not he is unable to speak of these things even to his most intimate associates. But they are to him the things worthily lived for, worthy to die for if need be.

It is true that he has his moments when the sublime terror of mere existence grips him, clutches him by the heart and leaves him a shivering coward. Then the splendour of the skies, the shimmer of the sea, the glory of the woods, seem but scenes in a panorama, flung in blind unconcern upon a screen whereon mortals, if they will, may try to decipher the meaning of the artist. We are a crowd of ants, pushed one here and there into oblivion as by the touch of unheeding fingers. The sun is the central spot of some great lens, illumined by a galaxy outside our ken, under the focus of which we are being examined and played with as we ourselves quiz the whirling animalculæ in a speck of water; and we resent it sullenly, hopelessly. There are moments, again, when problems of existence do not trouble us, when it is a joy simply to be alive, and we want no bought, hired, meretricious pleasures to bring us their extraneous distractions and delights. At such times the simplest things will send that strange, infrequent thrill coursing through the blood, make us draw the long breath of ecstasy as over a bunch of invisible flowers, whose scent took us by surprise: a field of poppies against the skyline; the exquisite green curve of a wave in that splendid instant before it crashes to the beach; the shiver of poplars in an evening breeze; a copse of foxgloves, a hill of heather, and a thousand others. More material, man-made things can also bring the sensation—the red sails of the fishing-fleet, homeward bound at sunset; a grim, grey battleship looming down harbour in a drench of rain; Piccadilly on a sunny morning. Whence come these moods of happiness, beauty, doubt, despair? What is the substance of life, rooted in which they grope unseen for a time, from which they spring and spread in an hour to blossoms intangible as moonlight, noxious as the nightshade, or exquisite as the first fair cluster of morning roses?

We cannot say, we dreamers. The answer is on the horizon, and the horizon for ever recedes. Just as no man can fix the instant when the first pale luminance in the east betrays the lifted robes of the passing night, nor say precisely of the autumn twilight, "It is here. . . . It is gone," so none can find the dividing-line between our souls and their bourne, nor fathom the depths of space and time through which our round, restless home wings its way. "The morning wind for ever blows; the poem of creation is uninterrupted; but few there be that hear it." If, as astronomers tell us, our sun, with his retinue of planets and their satellites, is journeying onward towards some mighty, undiscovered star; if, through the millions of years since he flamed into being he has only swung a hair's-breadth, as it were, of his awful orbit, carrying us with him whether we wish it or not, is it not possible that in the fresh spatial surroundings from age to age some new influence may be present and active, something not to be measured or detected by any instrument, only by its effect on the mind of man? May not ideas, discoveries, theorisings, stimulations, be held in space as truly as tangible meteoric dust is held, and deposited in the receptive soul of the thoughtful, reverent man, so that after a while his brain leaps to a sure flash of inspiration, and a conception is born which takes the world by storm? What else is the meaning of "inspiration"? "Every new star that is found in the sky will lend of its rays to the passions and thoughts and the courage of man." Are the external forces of life all blind and uncomprehending?

"There will ever remain something within our soul," writes a philosopher, "that would rather weep at times in a world that knows no limit than enjoy perpetual happiness in a world that is hemmed in." Profoundly true; with all our searching, with all our consciousness of the extent of our impotence, yet we are not vanquished, and the sting of failure is an incentive to renewed efforts, fresh explorations. All very impracticable, says the inevitable objector querulously; one cannot engage in business—earn one's living, to put it baldly—and be a mystic at the same time. But did not Hawthorne, gentlest of mystics, measure coal and climb about dirty vessels at Boston Custom-House? Hear him:

I have been measuring coal all day (he writes) on board of a black little British schooner, in a dismal dock at the north end of the city. Most of the time I paced the deck to keep myself warm, for the wind (north-east, I believe), blew up through the dock as if it had been the pipe of a pair of bellows. The vessel lying deep between two wharves there was no more delightful prospect, on the right hand and on the left, than the posts and timbers half immersed in the water and covered with ice, which the rising and falling of successive tides had left upon them, so that they looked like immense icicles. . . . Sometimes I descended into the dirty little cabin of the schooner and warmed myself by a red-hot stove, among biscuit-barrels, pots and kettles, sea-chests, and innumerable lumber of all sorts—my olfactories meanwhile being greatly refreshed with the odour of a pipe, which the captain, or some one of his crew, was smoking. But at last came the sunset, with delicate clouds and a purple light upon the islands; and I blessed it, because it was the signal of my release.

Here is the collision of the dreamer and the business man, with a vengeance. But, while on that point, was there not also a Carpenter, of Nazareth—the finest Dreamer that the world has ever known?

The dreamer pays a heavy price sometimes for his visions; in sudden distrustfulness of his own feelings, in fearful slips from his sunlit heights, in the dread that not one of his thoughts, perhaps, will ever come to full fruition. Yet he goes on telling his story, that perchance some poor, forlorn wanderer from the Islands of the Blest may hear it and take heart. For to be happy he must share the dream.

"ELECTRA" AT MILAN

"ELECTRA" at La Scala—Richard Strauss in Italy! That in itself was a sensation, and you felt the quiver of it in the air, for all Milan was there, on edge with curiosity! What Wagner, consummate artist as he was, dared not attempt, Strauss, the unparalleled man of affairs, has carried out successfully. One could not say he really took his audience by storm, for there were hisses, groans, and even sneers and laughter. But indifference there certainly was none! The audience accepted the new work with a keen interest, almost quite with genuine enthusiasm, which heightened to a real delight in the more lyric parts. Wagner knew his Italy so well, and loved it, too, but always recognised the depth of this wide chasm that separates the races—the difference in "tempo," both personally and in the field of Art. The Italian school is all for their "Bel Canto"—the lyric expression of a personality and an individual emotion. The German—and more particularly the modern German—suppresses the individual, making for the harmony of the whole—or for the effect, if harmony be lacking! The national fetich of military drill pervades their music, esprit de corps is their great theory, and their one invariable requirement is that no individual in the ranks shall ever dare stand out, no matter for what cause. In Italy, however, the standards are so different. There, if by any chance the chef d'orchestre should suddenly be moved to execute a flourish, or the soprano feel herself impelled to give the audience an extra trill, the thing is done, and the good people (particularly in the gallery) go wild with joy; for that is temperament, and these children of the south adore the free expression of an ardent and expansive nature. Form, finish, workmanship mean nothing to them here, compared with lyrical expression. With this in view, the wonder is what they could find in Strauss, and the surprise was great to find they did not down Electra from the very nature of the music. Strictly speaking, Electra is not an opera, but a tragedy accompanied by music—and not always that, for at times the accompaniment is simply noise. The voice, the singing parts, with a few notable and most beautiful exceptions, go quite for nothing, and are lost in the wild crash of the orchestra, which carries the whole burden of phrasing the ideas expressed by the pantomime. The music is descriptive rather than suggestive, and stridently declaims a fact instead of merely unfolding the thought developed by the action. Its facts are often crude and incidental, quite hindering the simple purpose of the plot. For instance, where the man is sent to ride and find the king, he orders up his horse. You hear them clap the saddle on, the horse champs at the bit, then paws, and off he goes at a quick trot—all this in the orchestra, not on the stage, but most vividly portrayed. This is not music—but it is wonderful! It is not art, but it is artifice, and Strauss must be saluted as Past Master among craftsmen—a "music-smith" par excellence! Again, a later phrase where Electra crouches digging up the hatchet for her fatal purpose; there comes a hurried scratching in the ground, a frantic clawing of earth and then of metal—all this expressed in plainest terms, with most uncanny finish. But the most wonderful mimetic moment is toward the last. Orestes has gone within, his mother waiting to receive him as bearing certain tidings of her son's untimely death, when suddenly the drums begin—low, throbbing, muffled—many, many drums! They seem to come from all about. Subdued, they presage something, and set your nerves on edge for what you know must come. The place seems full of that dull thumping. A noise that menaces—thrilling, prophetic, like the knocking at the gate in Macbeth. You peer instinctively about over your shoulder in the gloom to see what might be there behind you! And then it comes—a horrid, strangled shriek, a crash from the orchestra, and still those drums go on! Then one more scream—blood-curdling, hideous—and it is over. The first part of that inhuman vengeance is complete. Now comes the triumph of Electra to break the tension, and her dance is insolent, almost abandoned in its wild joy of retribution, yet it is stately. Most wonderful this is, but surely it is never music! Music should suggest, inspire, uplift—not act a brutal part nor offer up in detail the minute description of an unsavoury fact. One cannot say what Strauss might do were he to chose a different sort of subject. This new libretto has a most marvellous range of utterly superhuman emotions. Electra, child of a race descended from the gods, outraged, degraded, and shattered with grief, dominates the action with her fierce lust for vengeance. In all the play she has but three brief moments of a natural womanly emotion, and in these three short passages the music grows so sweet, so lyrical, so deeply human and appealing, one simply longs to hear what this strange man could do were he to chose a more inviting theme. Her first more gentle moment is the recollection of her father—the vision of him as he comes to her, a hero, strong and armed. But this soft thought is soon succeeded by the memory of his murder, and the cowardly blow comes crashing in to drown the beauty of the other picture. Then later, when she feels convinced that she herself must do the deed of vengeance, she asks her sister's help, and promises in softest strains the highest joys of womanhood for this one instant's horrid service. Finally, and most touching of them all, is the moment when Orestes comes, and she, recognizing that in her abject misery she has grown half inhuman, recalls her youth, her beauty and her budding womanhood, and sorrows for the loss of all her charms. These are the three affecting and harmonious movements of the opera, and to the most of us the rest is merely sound—though clever always, and never lacking in a certain interest and excitement. You feel throughout the artist's great capacity, his skilful handling of such strange material—but the result, though certainly to be admired, can hardly fail to irritate tremendously. As for its rendering, those who know La Scala can judge how well the play was staged, and how superbly that wonderful orchestra fulfilled its part in spite of all the difficulties. Although the house went frantic with applause for all the artists at the finish, particularly for their great conductor, who deserved the highest praise for his interpretation, one hardly felt the thing was really liked. The contract required that it should be given four times in this season, but judging from the first performance one would hardly say that it could ever be included in the general repertoire of opera in Italy. Yet as a spectacle and as an event, it truly was a gala night, and famous old La Scala lived nobly up to its most glorious traditions.

JOSEPH ISRAELS:

AN APPRECIATION.

ON January 27th Joseph Israels celebrated his eighty-fifth birthday amid considerable enthusiasm. Of late years the Dutch school of painting has been taking as firm a hold on the civilised world as it did in the seventeenth century. Mr. Israels must be considered the father and pathfinder of the modern Dutch movement as well as its coryphæus. He is among those fortunate men who keep growing younger to their very dying day. This faculty for growth becomes apparent when we compare his earliest to his latest work. The Muse's favourite rises by degrees. This is the main feature of Israels' path of development. Its slope is gentler than any other living master's. His first pictures contain little that prophesies his future greatness. There are scanty signs of any originality at all. A number of his admirers are even wont to speak of Israels in his two periods as of two different men. They would fain make the master ashamed of his earlier self. There is some excuse for this attitude. At first glance it appears, indeed, as though his early work did not fit into the course of development which his later work reveals. It would be interesting to see the little picture which brought him his first success. It was a portrait of a pastry-cook, painted at Groningen, his native town, when he was fifteen years old. His reward was a beautifully ornamented cake. Probably it was much in the style of the age. Early work of Matthew and James Maris surprises by its wonderful qualities. This is not the case with Israels, and for this reason. As far back as their school years we find something of the colouring and lively drawing which is so characteristic of the modern Hague school. Something of its emotional beauty, its intensity of expression, is already apparent. Joseph Israels was by ten years the senior of James Maris. When he started on his course the Krusemans and Pienemans were at the zenith of their glory. Not even a genius can altogether escape from the influence of his surroundings. It needs a sharp struggle to arrive at originality. During the decline which followed upon Holland's golden seventeenth century the sesame to the treasure cave of Art was in England's safe keeping. Thence it passed to France. The shock which Dutch Art required in order to raise it from its peaceful slumber of self-sufficiency came from that country. It came and set the air a-teeming with new spring life. It came at the very time when the brothers Maris first found themselves. Israels had then already passed through a hard-worked period. He had already produced a considerable number of pictures. His art was closely linked to that of his masters. First he had worked under Jan Pieneman at Amsterdam, then under Paul Delaroche at Paris. Finally he was under the spell of Ary Scheffer. Scheffer's influence appears, for instance, from Israels' first rendering of "Saul and David." At this time the yet older Bilders and Bosboom succeeded in breaking from tradition. Israels followed suit. It was in his nature to do so cautiously and step by step. He was born of an older generation than the Mauves and Marises. He was bred and trained among other ideas. His prejudices differed from theirs. Unlike his younger contemporaries, he must needs pass through a period of transition. Israels is a pathfinder; what he discovers, what he gains, is to the advantage of all who follow him. The foundation on which he builds is of his own making. Joseph Haydn has composed over a hundred symphonies. Scarcely a tenth part of them can be said to live. Mozart was as fertile in his shorter life. Beethoven left us but nine. Each of these nine counts. But Beethoven stood on the shoulders of his predecessors. The type of symphony which he adopted was of Haydn's finding. Hundreds of attempts the latter had to make before he could arrive at a final solution. In him the symphony has grown. Growing presupposes graduation. In Israels modern Dutch art has grown. Of its fruit all the present generation have eaten. If during this period of transition Israels' work shows much tradition and little of the throbbing of innate life we should remember his mixed extraction. By nature he is a Jew; by training he is a Dutchman. The one made him too prudent to betray his inward emotions; the other made him too sober to care for an unwarranted display of virtuosity. Israels is a hard striker, but a wary walker. We need but glance at those studies which were not intended for the public gaze to see the artist as he really was. Here the conventionality of the ruling school has lost much of its tight hold. Here appears what urged him on, what was fermenting within him. There is something in the brightness of the colours, in the nervous drawing of the figures, that reminds us of a sketch of Delacroix. At Picot's studio in Paris that same Delaroche, who so strongly influenced Israels' early work, had to struggle with a certain obstinacy in his pupil. Israels still tells, not without some glee, how Delaroche used to rate him for the flaws he thought he discovered in his drawing.

Even while subjected to the teaching of the academical Delaroche he was haunted by the romanticism of Delacroix, which, purified in Barbizon, was to regenerate itself into the modern school. If Israels' progress was slow it was all the more sure. It moved along a remarkably straight and steady line. His principle of art never changed; it only expanded until it reached that power of expression wherein form and contents are in perfect balance. It has been said that young authors should not begin by attempting at independent creation. They will acquire method and routine by adapting the current story or the historical fact. This Israels practised in art. He started as a history painter; partly this was owing to the influence of his masters and of the predominating taste. This period gave us, e.g., "Hamlet and his Mother," "Prince Maurice at his Father's Corpse," "Aaron finding the Corpses of his two Sons in the Tabernacle," "William the Silent and Margaret of Parma." The latter dates from 1855. It is in the Amsterdam Municipal Museum. Soon he gave up this type of work. The second "Saul and David" is the only adaptation he produced in later years. Still, there was more than the view to training or the power of convention that drew him to the genre-picture. It must also have appealed to him by its nature. Jews are naturally fond of emphatic action. They have a sense of drama. They even tend to become theatrical. Even in his next period Israels remained true to the genre-picture. This will appear from such titles as "After the Storm," "Alone in the World," "From Darkness to Light," "Passing by the Churchyard," "The Shipwrecked Sailor." It was these pictures which gave him his early popularity. This was especially the case among those circles which cannot judge of real artistic merit. In the preceding period others provided him with a theme for his art. In the present he made his own fiction. He spent these years at Jandvoort, a village among the dunes on the Dutch coast. He lived the life of the plain fisherman. He took part in his struggle for existence, his alternating hopes and fears. He came into daily touch with the tragedy of rough reality. It was on the scene of this everlasting fight between man and the elements that his art ripened into a purer and more subtle expression of emotion. Joseph Israels styles himself a subject-painter. This means that he tries to fascinate not only through the picture as a painting, but also through the subject. Once a friend visited the master's studio while he was busy with a portrait of the Hague pedlar, Jacob Stedel, the prototype of "A Son of the Old People." He wondered that Israels, who up to then had been so exclusively a subject-painter, should now be able to concentrate his artistic self in so entirely a subjectless picture. Israels answered that to him this portrait was a subject. In it he saw a whole life-story. His sympathy was able to trace there the experience of the man's past, his feelings and emotions. The other ventured to reply that likely the artist felt more deeply than his model. "Oh, yes, of course," said Israels; "in that tree yonder I also see all sorts of things, and surely it cannot feel at all." The painting of subjects is a dangerous work. Painters who are not artists in the higher sense often have recourse to it. They lack the really artistic sentiment; they remain untouched by what they see; they try by sketching more or less ingeniously devised incidents to create a dramatic, a tragic, an edifying or a humorous impression. Even if the incident be cleverly painted, the aim is not lastingly reached. A mother weeping by her dead child's cradle may rouse the spectator to pity. If it be only the representation, the incident, that moves him the emotion will not be deeply felt. The outward touches but the outward. Soon the mother will appear a cleverly painted doll, a model placed in the desired position by the painter in order to copy it. Israels knows how to blend the two elements into so perfect a unity that the one loses itself in the other; the one results from the other. At least, in his riper work the one element never predominates over the other. The story is revealed to the spectator's spirit rather than told to his mind. Take, for instance, his "Alone in the World." It is a death-room. In the bedstead lies the corpse of the husband, who has died during the night. In a chair in front of it the bereft widow is seated sorrowing silently. Here subject and surroundings are in perfect harmony. Death not only haunts the bedstead; everything in the dim room is dead. The pale light of dawn comes slowly flowing through the window. It awakens the languishing lines and hues. It is a symbol of the immortality of life. This never is wanting in Israels' pictures. At times it assumes the grand proportions of a vision. Take his second "Saul and David." There is a hymn of young, sunny, newly-arisen life in that sky, beaming with gold, which forms the background to this masterpiece. Take his "Life's Evening." An old and portly gentleman is slowly and musingly seen to walk through his park. Here everything speaks of passing—and of eternity. We read this message in the silent central figure. We read it in the quiet majesty of dying nature. We read it in the bright, wide evening sky, which to-morrow will shine with as splendid a silver radiancy. Perhaps this is the master's most sublime creation. The Muse's favourite rises by slow degrees. From year to year the dramatic element in Israels' art simplifies itself. At last he succeeds in focussing a whole world of thought and feeling on a single figure. He makes it speak to us. The fainting sound of its words passes beyond the horizon of the visual. It sets us free from ourselves. It carries us into the Avelon of meditation. This is the elevating power of his art. It has its spring in the religiousness of the Jew, in his Old-Testament faith. Faith, hope and charity, these three form the ethical element in Israels' art. There are few among his pictures where through the dingy panes we do not get a glad glimpse of God's glory abroad. His peasants living their life of poverty and destitution, his fishermen and fishermen bear the tragedy of their existence with acquiescence. They are averse to all bitterness and rebelliousness. This shows a mind in which the confidence in God's justice stands unshakable. Jewish, too, is the patriarchal ideal which he emblemises in the unity of family life. Not one other painter has rendered its intimate character with so great a fervour. This sense of unity in his interiors has raised Israels to be the founder of an original aspect of art. Its parallel is not to be found, neither in pictures ancient nor modern. Not one detail is added for its own sake. Not the smallest object, not the meanest piece of furniture could be spared. Israels' pictures are wonders of composition. But we do not notice that they have been composed. When asked, he will account for every detail. His imaginative spirit is under the perfect control of his sober intellect. Take his "Mid-day Meal." The central idea is in the closely pressing together of parents and children, in the close relation of the objects with each other and with their owners. It reveals itself in the harmony of the inanimate with the animate. In shape and colour the former has adapted itself to the latter, for whose use it exists. It is this wondrously subtle adaptability which in atmosphere and spirit identifies the surroundings with the central group of persons. Israels' sense of action, which gradually ripened, etherealised itself into psychical action, must be ascribed to his Jewish extraction. The same can be said of his other characteristic: the ethical atmosphere which pervades his art, which gives it that pious, religious character, that fervent, intimate nature. But his Dutch birth and education have undoubtedly intensified this sentiment. The reserve of the Dutch mind, its dislike of outward show, its peacefulness, its settledness, its soberness have saved him from the exaggeration which might have weakened his innate tenderheartedness to effeminacy, which might have degenerated his sense of drama and lyrical poetry into theatrical bombast. Joseph Israels has imbibed the spirit of two races; each has completed and purified the other. Thus arose this rare artist whom the Dutch honour as the fairest orchid in their garden.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL SOCIETY.

The monthly meeting of this Society was held on Wednesday evening, the 21st instant, at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Mr. H. Mellish, President, in the chair.

Mr. Baldwin Latham, M.Inst.C.E., read a paper on "Percolation, Evaporation and Condensation," in which he gave the results of the observations which he had carried out at Croydon on these subjects during the last 30 years. Two percolation gauges were used, both of which were exactly a superficial yard in area, and contained a cubic yard of natural soil, one of chalk and the other of gravel. The average annual amount of percolation through the chalk gauge was 10.84 in., and through the gravel gauge 10.34 in. The average yearly rainfall was 25.46 in. It appears that the rate of percolation is governed by the rate of rainfall, for when once the gauges have become sensitive, by being thoroughly wetted, the rate at which rain percolates depends entirely on the quantity of rain immediately falling. The evaporator used for determining the evaporation was a floating copper vessel 1 ft. in diameter, supported by a life-buoy ring, connected by four arms with the evaporating vessel, the whole being floated in a tank 4 ft. internal diameter, containing about 3 ft. depth of water. The average annual amount of evaporation by this gauge was 18.14 in., and the average amount of condensation was .36 in.

A paper on "The Meteorological Conditions in the Philippine Islands, 1908," by the Rev. José Algué, S.J., Director of the Philippine Weather Bureau, was read by the Secretary. The year 1908 was one of extraordinary meteorological conditions. Heavy floods occurred, and frequent violent cyclonic storms passed over or affected the Archipelago. The author stated that out of the fourteen typhoons of extraordinary intensity which have occurred during the past 29 years, five occurred in the year 1908, the most violent being those of September 23rd, October 13th, and December 5th. It seems that the part of the Archipelago that is visited the most frequently by these extraordinary typhoons is the northern part of Luzon from the parallel $15^{\circ} 30'$ to the Batanes Islands and from parallel 11° to 14° N.

THE INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.

At the ordinary meeting on Tuesday, the 20th April, 1909, Mr. J. C. Inglis, President, in the chair, the paper read was "The New York Times Building," by C. T. Purdy, M.Inst.C.E. The following is an abstract of the paper:—

Early in 1902 the proprietors of the New York Times determined to move from the newspaper district near the City Hall to quarters in the newer part of the city. The site selected for the new building is bounded on the north and south by Forty-third and Forty-second Streets, and on the east and west by Broadway and Seventh Avenue. The Underground Railway, in curving from Forty-second Street into Broadway, crosses the north end of the property, passing through the basement of the building. The paper describes the building and discusses the special features of its steel construction due to the existence and operation of the Underground Railway.

The length of the block is 137 ft. 9 in. from north to south, the width at the south end is 58 ft. 4 in., while at the north end it is only 20 ft. On three sides, however, the basement stories extend under the sidewalk. The height of the building from the sidewalk to the twenty-third storey is 329 ft., and above this is an observatory and lantern, the roof of which is 30 ft. higher; the basement stories extend 48 feet below the level of the sidewalk.

The framework of the building is constructed of steel, and the walls are of brick, with limestone and pressed-brick facings and terra-cotta trimmings. All the structural steel is covered and protected with terra-cotta material laid in cement-mortar. Four high-speed elevators serve the building, and all heating is by means of steam.

The subway through which the Underground Railway runs is owned by the City, and in dealing with the subway problem two things were required: First, the two structures of the subway and the Times building were to be entirely independent of one another; and, secondly, the building had to be protected from the vibratory effects of passing trains. In a number of cases the building columns came between the railway tracks, and the columns supporting the subway came through the lowest basement storey, which extends partly underneath the subway; but in practically all cases an air space was left round each column, and there was thus no connection between the two.

The building is supported on columns which rest on a rock foundation. The waterproofing of the basement extends continuously over the entire area and up the retaining-walls to the street level. Mains are laid from the outside to a sump inside the building, so that no hydrostatic pressure can come on to the retaining walls.

The paper describes the methods used in calculating the dead and live loads for each storey, and for determining the section of the columns. Typical column load-sheets are given explaining how this is done. Owing to the extreme narrowness of the building the stresses from wind load were considerable. To resist these the floor-girders were increased in depth, and extra heavy girders were used in the spandrel construction round the building. In addition three special panels were used extending the entire width of the building, being formed by bracing between the columns. The total dead weight of the building is 33,611,000 lb. (15,000 tons). In no case was a column stressed to more than 13,000 lb. per sq. in. without wind load, nor to more than 19,500 lb. per sq. in. with it.

The paper then deals with the problem of vibration arising out of the Underground Railway. In addition to making the structure of the subway independent of the building, it was arranged to found the supporting columns of the former on cushions of sand, and thus still further to insulate the building. The results at first were quite satisfactory, and no vibration was felt from passing trains; but later distinct vibration was detected, and at last this became very pronounced. Seismograph observations were taken, and a thorough examination of the two structures was made, the results being stated in the paper.

The trouble disappeared when the railway company relaid the tracks through the building, all perceptible vibration then ceasing. The author considers, nevertheless, that the insulation of the two structures and the provision of the sand-cushions for the subway columns have a material effect in producing this result. Under many conditions such insulation of structural members would be the most effective and economical method of preventing vibration. It is stated that it was certainly efficient in the Times building, which has four railway tracks through it, and often three or four trains in the building at the same time, some stopping, and others passing through at high speeds.

It has taken years for the majority of the leading magazines to reach anywhere near where Nash's Magazine begins. Nash's Magazine is a gigantic undertaking: the paper used for No. 1 would, if unrolled, stretch from London to Edinburgh—a distance of over 400 miles. Its policy will be to give to the public each month a magazine containing stories by the world's most famous novelists.

“SCORPIO.” By J. A. CHALONER

“ He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible bitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man ‘to sleep’ with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chaloner believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-headed scorpion, and he dubs the whole effort ‘Scorpio.’ So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chaloner goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls ‘The Devil’s Horseshoe.’ We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

Rich as Colocle’s mine in lessons rare—
That gum-bedizen’d ‘horse-shoe’ at th’ Opera,
Rhapsods with costly hags and matrons fair!
His votaresses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chaloner steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare’s memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SELAW, owing to the latter’s important comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, ROANOKE RAPIDS, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spang’d with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Grown whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music’s very nice.”

“Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chaloner to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing.”—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

LIFE AND LETTERS

It is very unfortunate that some arrangement has not been arrived at which would have the effect of preventing a three-cornered contest at Stratford-on-Avon. At present there seems to be a distinct possibility that the Radical candidate, Mr. Joseph Martin, a carpet-bagging Colonial, whose knowledge of English politics would appear to be of the slightest, may manage to secure his election owing to the detachment from the official Unionist candidate of a large number of voters. The Standard, in a recent leading article, advocated the claims of Captain Kincaid-Smith, the Independent Liberal, who has resigned his seat on the question of universal service. This is, no doubt, very chivalrous on the part of the Standard; but it seems to us most unfortunate that a Conservative newspaper should throw over the official Conservative or Unionist candidate on merely sentimental grounds. It would be quite another matter if there were anything to be alleged against Mr. Foster, but the Standard itself admits that he is an admirable candidate, and in every way worthy of the confidence of the constituency. Mr. Foster declares that he is not in favour of universal compulsory military service, while Captain Kincaid-Smith is in favour of such service. Well, the Conservative and Unionist Party is not at present committed to approbation of compulsory military service, and Mr. Foster in declining to go further for the moment than the leader of his own party is adopting the only possible correct attitude. Under these circumstances, it seems to us very hard that the Standard should throw its undoubted weight and influence into the scales against him. It is all very well to talk about keeping matters of national defence affairs outside and above questions of party; but unfortunately they are irrevocably mixed up in questions of party, and the action of the present Government has once again made it quite clear that it is useless to look to a Liberal Government for a proper appreciation of the needs of the two services. Apart from that, why should the Conservative voters be called upon to vote for a man who, however sound his views may be on the question of national defence, is an out and out Radical, an avowed enemy of the Church of England, and a strong supporter of those who would disestablish the Church and confiscate her revenues? What we should like to know is how it comes about that a man of Captain Kincaid-Smith's opinions on the subject of national defence ever found it consistent with his principles and his conscience to ally himself with a party which is, and was long before the arrival of the present naval crisis, notoriously the party of Little Englandism and peace at any price. The question of compulsory military service is not one which can conceivably be raised during the lifetime of the present Government. On the other hand, the question of disestablishment has actually been raised, and will continue to be one of the dominant issues of the present situation. In these circumstances it seems to us that it is the plain duty of every Conservative and Unionist voter to vote for Mr. Foster.

There is something peculiarly mean and cruel in the way the newspapers as a whole are commenting on the deposition of the Sultan. The Sultan, up to a few days ago, was the reigning monarch of a friendly nation, and as such entitled to the same courtesy and consideration as any other monarch. A revolution has taken place in Turkey, and the revolutionary party are for the moment in power. Practically the whole English Press has for months past been engaged in egging on the so-called "Young Turks" to the deeds of violence and cruelty which are inseparable from revolutions in any country and at any time. The "Young Turks," having obtained possession of Constantinople and the person of the Sultan, have proceeded to give expression to their love of "liberty" and "progress" in the manner which is almost invariably adopted by successful revolutionary bodies. That is to say, they are murdering, imprisoning and torturing their political opponents, who, after all, are merely guilty of the crime of loyalty to their sovereign, in a way which is quite sufficient to dispose of their claims to represent a disinterested movement for liberty. Here is a quotation from the report of the Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung:

Long troops of prisoners are being dragged through the streets, chained together. There were white-bearded men, officers and non-commissioned officers among them. This sight was, indeed, sufficient to excite human sympathy even in the hearts of the political opponents of these unhappy men, and our sympathy was transformed into keen resentment when we saw how many of these prisoners were beaten and even tortured. In diplomatic circles and among foreigners in Constantinople the attitude of the victors creates the worst possible impression. The numerous arrests which have been made during the last few days prove that the Young Turks have lapsed into a policy of revenge and hatred which was characteristic of the reign of Ahmed Riza.

The whole revolution, like all revolutions—not excepting the French Revolution—has been based on lies, on slander and unspeakable corruption, the real object of the revolutionaries being to obtain possession of other people's money and property. It has been successful, and the Sultan, who for upwards of thirty years has contrived to keep Turkey together in the face of all the greedy Powers and all the internal and interminable intrigues and dissensions of his own people, has been deposed by armed force. We prophesy that the result will be the break-up of Turkey and its partition among the Powers within the next dozen years. Meanwhile, the Daily Telegraph considers it to be in good taste to publish reports which, to say the least of it, are unsupported by any respectable evidence regarding the demeanour of the Sultan when, deserted by all his guards and all his supporters, he faced the leaders of the revolutionary party. According to the Daily Telegraph's correspondent, who could not by any conceivable possibility have been present on this tragic occasion, he was found "hiding in the harem." As a matter of fact, he was not hiding at all, but merely awaiting the arrival of the enemy in the company of the women of the Palace, who alone had not deserted him. The veracious correspondent of the Daily Telegraph goes on to inform us that on being dragged before the "six personages" "he turned pale with fear, trembled and cried in terror: 'Why do you want my life?'" We are further informed that "he whined pitifully: 'Only let me live and I will do all that you wish'"; and finally the purveyor of this melodramatic clap-trap to the columns of our great middle-class penny daily informs us that "the Sultan, pale as a spectre, sank on to a divan." We shall take the liberty of stating quite plainly that the whole of this report is utterly untrue and devoid of foundation. The Times correspondent, who is, at any rate, quite as trustworthy as the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, informs us that "the deposed Sultan received the news with the utmost calm, merely expressing the hope that his own and his children's lives might be saved." The editors of so-called Conservative newspapers, who satisfy the morbid craving for sensation of their readers in the manner adopted by the Daily Telegraph, may take it from us that if—as God forbid!—the revolutionary element in this country were to obtain command of the situation, as it is not inconceivable that it might, the world's Press, sedulously supplied with news by the successful revolutionaries, would celebrate "the glorious triumph of liberty and the rights of man" in precisely the same cowardly and mendacious terms and with precisely the same insulting calumnies as to the demeanour of our own sovereign as they have employed in the case of Abdul Hamid.

The noble army of frumps, otherwise the Women's International Suffrage Congress, is having a great time. Representative cranks from nations all over the world, under the "chairmanship" of a lady bearing the appropriate name of Catt, have been giving full scope to their propensity for talking illogical nonsense to their already converted friends. All this is quite harmless, and if it amuses the lady Suffragists we shall not begrudge them their enjoyment. The good ladies are greatly exhilarated because they have received a telegram of greeting from the Queen of Norway. This telegram is, of course, of absolutely no importance to anybody, except to Queen Maud herself, though the sending of it was a foolish indiscretion, for which Queen Maud is likely to get into trouble with her husband and her father. Meanwhile, while the constitutional Suffragists were making their childish and ineffectual speeches the militant section of the movement was "demonstrating" in St. Stephen's Hall. On Tuesday last four hysterical female idiots chained themselves to the statues in the Hall and continued to yell at the top of their voices until the police arrived with chain pincers and removed them; while at Stratford-on-Avon a Miss Craig, who, it appears, has the distinction of being the daughter of Miss Ellen Terry, went through the ridiculous farce of asking the Under-Sheriff whether he was prepared to receive a nomination paper on behalf of a woman candidate. It looks as if there were to be no cessation of all this insensate folly, and one is puzzled to know how long the shrieking sisterhood will think it worth while to keep up their agitation. Any remote chance that they ever possessed of inducing the good-natured and long-suffering men of this country to entrust them with votes has utterly disappeared. On the other hand, the funds of the various societies for obtaining the suffrage for women seem to be in a flourishing condition, and as long as there is plenty of money to spend, and to get, the agitation will continue. Probably, however, the advent at the next general election of a strong Conservative Government will put an end to the whole of the sordid and miserable business. Until then sane and decent people of both sexes must be content to possess their souls in patience, and to endeavour to let their sense of humour compensate them for their feelings of disgust and indignation at the deplorable and humiliating spectacle which a small minority of ignorant and ill-mannered women are affording to the eyes of the world at large.

The letter which we print in our correspondence columns from Captain Hayes deals with a subject which is somewhat outside the ordinary range of THE ACADEMY, and we perhaps owe some apology to our readers for discussing it in our editorial notes; but it will be within the recollection of our readers that we ourselves, like Captain Hayes, have been made the victim of an unscrupulous bookmaker; and as the matter is one of undoubted public interest we shall make no bones about dealing with it. There appears to be a sort of vague impression going about that anything connected with betting is disreputable, and that for the editor of a literary paper to make a bet is altogether quite shocking. This, of course, is mere cant. A man who makes a bet is precisely on the same footing as a man who invests his money in stocks or shares, whether they be connected with gold mines or industrial securities. In only one respect does such a man differ from the investor of money in the City. The difference is an important one. While the speculator in the City is protected by the law from fraud and dishonesty on the part of stockbrokers and others, the unfortunate "punter" is compelled to rely entirely on the sense of honour and business common-sense of the bookmaker with whom he deals. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred bookmakers who attend race-meetings are perfectly honest and honourable men. Such a thing as the repudiation of a bet and the raising of the plea of the Gaming Act is almost entirely unknown among them at the present day. But it is far otherwise in the case of men carrying on business as "turf accountants" in starting price offices in London. Innumerable instances have come to our notice in which people who have betted with these "turf accountants" have been done out of their gains. Small sums of from ten to fifty pounds are usually paid without demur, but the moment it comes to anything over a hundred pounds your "turf accountant" begins to look round for a convenient excuse for not meeting his obligations. The usual method of procedure is to get up some sort of a row or quarrel and to trust to the undoubted fact that ninety-nine men out of a hundred, when confronted with the possibility of a disagreeable scene with a usually foul-mouthed opponent, prefer to lose their money and to say no more about it, or to accept a small proportion of the amount due to them for the sake of peace and quietness. When, by exception, the "turf accountant" happens to tumble up against a man who is not affected by these considerations he usually gets off scot-free by pleading the Gaming Act. In the case of the man Read, to which we drew the attention of our readers a few weeks ago, events have taken their usual course. Mr. Read has refused to pay, and he is to be sued for the money.

He has announced the fact that he intends to defend the action, and the only possible defence he can make is to plead the Gaming Act. Whether or not this plea will avail him in the present case is another matter. A recent decision of Mr. Justice Grantham has shown that we are happily not without judges who decline to allow the law to be stretched in favour of defaulting "turf accountants." However, that is neither here nor there, and it is just barely possible that we are doing Mr. Read an injustice, and that he does not intend to plead the Gaming Act after all. In that case these remarks must not, of course, be taken to apply to him. But that they are true of a very large proportion of those who engage in starting-price business in London is an undoubted and demonstrable fact. What we should like to know is the reason of the extraordinary inactivity of the police in these matters. A turf accountant is either what he purports to be—namely, a commission agent who is engaged in legitimate business and who is debarred from pleading the Gaming Act or he is a bookmaker carrying on an illegal business. In the latter alternative his premises should be raided by the police. Your bright "turf accountant" cannot have it both ways, and we invite the police to do their plain duty in the matter—that is to say, whenever it is brought to their notice that one of these men has repudiated a debt by pleading the Gaming Act, thereby admitting that he is a bookmaker and not a commission agent, the police should raid his premises and close them.

The following correspondence has taken place between Lord Alfred Douglas and the editor of the Spectator, or, rather, his secretary. It speaks for itself, and we shall make no comment:

From Lord Alfred Douglas to Mr. St. Loe Strachey:

April 28th, 1909.

J. St. Loe Strachey, Esq.

SIR,—As has been pointed out in the columns of this paper you have been guilty of what may be charitably called a blunder in taking an article printed in this paper and publishing it in your own columns without a word of explanation or apology. I can quite understand that you may have been led into this unfortunate act by misadventure, but that does not absolve you from the duty of making reparation for what you have done. No reference whatever has been made to the matter in your paper, and you have not had the common civility to communicate with me on the subject. I shall, therefore, be obliged if you will forward me a cheque for five guineas in payment for the copyright matter which you have appropriated from my paper.

I must request you to give your immediate attention to this matter, and to favour me with an immediate reply to this letter.—I am, sir, Your obedient servant,

ALFRED DOUGLAS.

Lord Alfred Douglas to Mr. St. Loe Strachey:

April 29th, 1909.

J. St. Loe Strachey, Esq.

SIR,—As you have not replied to my letter, I beg to inform you that unless I hear from you by to-morrow morning I shall issue a writ for the recovery of the sum mentioned in my letter without further notice.

I am, sir, Your obedient servant,

ALFRED DOUGLAS.

Mr. St. Loe Strachey to the Editor of THE ACADEMY:

Thursday, April 29th, 1909.

DEAR SIR,—I am directed by the Editor of the Spectator to acknowledge your letter of the 28th April, and to forward you the enclosed cheque for £5 5s. The cheque is sent in consideration of an article published in the Spectator of Saturday, April 10th, an article which had previously been published in THE ACADEMY, and the copyright of which had, therefore, been acquired by that paper.

I am, sir, Your obedient servant,

J. E. BAKER, Sec.

The Editor and Proprietor THE ACADEMY.

Lord Alfred Douglas to Mr. St. Loe Strachey:

April 29th, 1909.

J. St. Loe Strachey, Esq.

SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from your secretary enclosing a cheque for five guineas in payment of the copyright article which appeared in the Spectator of April 10th, which article had previously appeared in the columns of THE ACADEMY. I am sending the cheque to the Royal Literary Fund, as my object in making you pay for your blunder was, I need hardly say, not to obtain money from you, but to bring home to you a sense of responsibility which you have hitherto completely, and, as I think, discourteously, ignored. I note that up to the last you have persisted in your purely idiotic attitude of refusing to reply to me personally, as one gentleman to another. On what principle of etiquette you persist in this attitude I do not pretend to understand. I will content myself with pointing out to you that whether considered from a social, a literary, or an intellectual point of view I am your superior, and that your misguided determination to keep up your imaginary dignity has not only cost you five guineas, but has put you in the position of a man who has been reluctantly compelled by threats of legal proceedings to do what most gentlemen would have offered to do without any pressure whatever. The smallest word of apology or explanation, either in the columns of your paper or privately to me, would, I need hardly say, have relieved me from the disagreeable necessity of compelling you to make a money payment for a perfectly excusable error. You are now in the position of a person who has been fined, and I hope it will be a lesson to you.

I am, sir, Your obedient servant,

ALFRED DOUGLAS.

IN THE SOUTH

I was pale and sad in the South like the olive-trees
That droop their silver heads by the dusty roads,
And are grave and cold and grey in spite of the sun . . .
In the veils of rose and blue that the bright dawn spun
Day wrapped me round in vain!
I longed for the lovers and friends I had left behind,
I longed for the North again.

I was deaf to song, and even to beauty blind,
Blind to the magic woof that summer weaves,
While roses beat their pearl and ruby leaves
Against my window pane . . .
And orange flowers so passionately white,
So richly perfumed, pined for my delight:
Only my faint heart sighed,
In pity when the glory waned and died,
For all that lovely life unsatisfied!

I was pale and sad in the South like the olive-trees
That droop their silver heads by the dusty roads . . .

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

HYACINTHUS

FAIR boy, how gay the morning must have seemed
Before the fatal game that murdered thee!
Of such a dawn my wistful heart has dreamed:
Surely I too have lived in Arcady
When Spring, lap-full of roses, ran to meet
White Aphrodite risen from the sea . . .

Perchance I saw thee then, so glad and fleet,
Hasten to greet Apollo, stoop to bind
The gold and jewelled sandals on his feet,
While he so radiant, so divinely kind,
Lured thee with honeyed words to be his friend,
All heedless of thy fate, for Love is blind.

For Love is blind and cruel, and the end
Of every joy is sorrow and distress.
And when immortal creatures lightly bend
To kiss the lips of simple loveliness,
Swords are unsheathed in silence, and clouds rise,
Some God is jealous of the mute caress . . .

But who shall mourn thy death—ah, not the wise?
Better to perish in thy happiest hour,
To close in sight of beauty thy dark eyes,
And, dying so, be changed into a flower,
Than that the stealthy and relentless years
Should steal that grace which was thy only dower.

And bring thee in return dull cares and tears,
And difficult days and sickness and despair . . .
O, not for thee the griefs and sordid fears
That, like a burden, trembling age must bear;
Slain in thy youth, by the sweet hands of Love,
Thou shalt remain for ever young and fair . . .

THE COMMERCIAL MUSE

THE Times of last Monday published a long letter from Mr. William Watson under the heading: "The Tragedy of John Davidson." Mr. Watson assumes, of course, that Mr. Davidson is dead, and there seems unfortunately to be no possible reason to doubt that Mr. Davidson is dead and that he died by his own hand. This is undoubtedly a tragedy in the sense that all deaths are tragic and that deaths by suicide are more tragic than natural deaths. We deeply regret the death of Mr. Davidson. We hereby express our most sincere condolences to Mr. Davidson's widow and his family. We have already expressed our opinion that the pension given to Mr. Davidson by the nation should be continued to his widow, and we should be glad to use any means that lie in our power to assist Mrs. Davidson in obtaining a continuance of that pension. We wish it to be clearly understood that the remarks which we now feel called upon to make are called forth by Mr. William Watson's letter alone, and that they are not intended in any way to reflect on the memory of the late poet. But in the interests of poetry, and of literature generally, we feel that we cannot allow Mr. Watson's letter, with its extraordinarily wrong-headed conclusions and deductions, to pass without protest. From the beginning of Mr. Watson's letter we quote the following paragraph:

When recently an utterly insignificant and uninteresting young woman resorted to the "appearance" of disappearance in order to escape her creditors, this great nation went into throes of excitement over the trumpery affair, but when a man who had worn out his fiery heart and brain in its service goes down to some grave as unknown as his who heard the thunders of Sinai—goes down to it in the last bitterness of despair—the British nation is uninterested and unmoved.

When Mr. Watson deprecates the ludicrous prominence given by the hapenny papers to the sham disappearance of one whom he very properly describes as "an utterly insignificant and uninteresting young woman," we are at one with him; but when he goes on to inform us that "this great nation went into throes of excitement over the trumpery affair" we shall take leave to point out to him that he is talking nonsense. Mr. William Watson is something of a poet, and he is also a great deal of a journalist, and it is therefore not surprising that he should mistake the commercial pulsations of the Pearson-cum-Harmsworth-cum-Newnes heart—or, as one might say, circulation—for the heart-beats of the British nation. Mr. Watson must allow us to inform him that the amount of space allotted by the editors and proprietors of various hapenny papers on the look out for a "scoop" bears no relation whatever to the amount of interest which was excited in the public mind by the "disappearance" of Miss Violet Charlesworth and the death of Mr. John Davidson respectively. The fact that the editor and proprietor of the Daily Mail and similar organs choose to stuff their columns with blatant tomfoolery about an utterly uninteresting young woman proves nothing at all about the British nation. It merely reflects, in a not altogether flattering way, on the mentality of the aforesaid editors and proprietors, and proves that they are incapable of discriminating between what are and what are not matters of public interest. The members of the British public can no more prevent the Daily Mail and kindred organs from slinging slush at them than they can prevent the rain from rattling down on their umbrellas. But there is no evidence whatever that they like slush any more than they like rain, and when Mr. Watson gives us to understand that he measures the interest of the public mind by the utterances of the hapenny papers he merely succeeds in proving that he completely misunderstands the whole situation. Mr. Watson proceeds to give us a very complete insight into his own state of mind with regard to poetry. He informs us that "John Davidson died because he could not make a living." He goes on to say: "It would appear that fiction is the only form of literature which retains any power of effective appeal to the popular intelligence. I suppose there are fifty paltry novelists who make anything from a thousand to two thousand a year, but it is as possible as it was in the early days of Samuel Johnson for a genius capable of conferring lustre on any age or country to live in obscurity and cruel neglect, and to die from the accumulative fury of a lifetime." Elsewhere in his letter he says: "His blood is upon us, as surely as if we had slain him with our very hands." Not one of these statements is altogether true. In the first place, Mr. Davidson did not die because he could not make a living. We have the evidence of his family and his publisher that he was in no financial difficulties; and we know that he had a pension of a hundred pounds a year. And as for living "in obscurity and cruel neglect," was ever such nonsense talked about a man who was boomed and praised and talked about in the Press to the extent that Mr. Davidson was boomed and praised and talked about? The fact of the matter is that Mr. Davidson suffered a great deal more from over-praise than from any lack of it. We were continually being informed by the daily and weekly papers that he was a great poet, and that when he took to writing crude blasphemies about the Deity and informing us that he, John Davidson, had given us the greatest message that the world had ever known, he was writing great poetry, and that those of us who were disgusted and annoyed were showing our ignorance and our incapability of appreciating his "virile intellect." The result of all this irresponsible and absurd laudation on the part of all sorts of obscure people who were allowed to spread themselves in the various newspapers was to turn the head and upset the balance of Mr. Davidson, and to encourage him in the absolutely unwarrantable belief that it was the sacred duty of the nation to provide for him in a liberal manner, and that its failure to do this was a lasting reproach to the good taste of the community at large. As a matter of fact no poet who is worth considering cares or thinks anything about money where his poetry is concerned. A poet writes to please himself, and because he has that to say which cannot be said in prose. The moment he begins thinking about the pecuniary rewards or losses that may result from his poetry he ceases to be a poet. And when Mr. Watson says, as he does elsewhere in his letter, that "a poet's output nowadays may be as large as, say, the entire work of Virgil, but it will only be regarded as an instalment, and he must still meet the more or less insincere clamour for volume after volume, when each successive book is only another proclamation of the decadence and dissolution of his overwrought powers"—Mr. Watson is committing himself to statements which are wildly wide of the mark. There is no clamour, sincere or otherwise, for the work of the thousand and one men who believe themselves to be poets. Most poets even of the best order write far too much, but to do them justice we do not think that as a rule they do this with any idea of getting money. Of course, we shall be told that a poet must live, and that in order to live he must earn money if he does not happen to be fortunate enough to have private means. We quite admit it. All we maintain is that a poet has no right to look to his poetry as a source of income. Mr. Davidson, like any other poet who makes his mark in contemporary letters, was assured of the opportunity of earning, at any rate, a decent livelihood by what is called literary journalism. Any man who can write really good poetry can also write good prose. An editor who does not know this knows nothing about his own business. The lack of understanding as to a poet's true function and his claims upon the world is largely responsible for the failure of Mr. Davidson and Mr. Watson himself to keep their general poetical work up to the level obtained by them in a few isolated instances. A man who writes a sonnet with one eye on the pension list and the other on the political views of the editor of the paper to whom he proposes to offer it is not doing his duty by the Muses, and poets who go about whining that they and their friends and colleagues are cruelly deprived of pecuniary assistance which ought to be handed out to them by a grateful public are doing a very ill service to poetry. Your true poet would rather write a perfectly beautiful poem and die of starvation in the gutter immediately afterwards than receive a cheque for a thousand guineas from the editor of a hapenny paper for writing a series of sonnets devoted to the abuse of the sovereign of a foreign country whose views of government did not happen to fit in with his own. But Mr. William Watson knows nothing about these things, and Mr. John Davidson knew nothing about them, and that is why neither of them can ever hope to rank with poets of the highest class. The heavenly Muse is not disposed to have much truck with the Muse of commerce.

BURLINGTON HOUSE

FIRST NOTICE.

THIS notice is not occupied with discoveries, but mainly with the pictures that first meet the eye—those hung upon the line. Water-colours, architectural drawings, and sculpture must be entirely omitted for the present. As regards the Exhibition generally, there is cause for rejoicing in the absence of from a hundred to two hundred and fifty oil pictures, as compared with the numbers of the previous four years, whatever might have been their merits. And it must be noticed that glass over the canvases is now allowed for the first time. This innovation cuts both ways; glass may obscure defects, but it increases the oily effect of new painting, and introduces the figures of the spectator and his companions into the pictures, much to their confusion. On the whole, those artists are the wiser who have not availed themselves of the concession. Intrinsically, the most striking feature of the exhibition is the large number of portrait-painters now flourishing, many of them, such as Mr. Arthur Nowell, Mr. Hugh Riviere, Mr. Robert Morrison and Mr. Greville Manton, not bearing very familiar names, who possess the faculty of imparting a very notable verisimilitude to their subjects, even when the features of these are quite unknown to the observer. In many instances, indeed, the attention is so focussed upon the face that it runs the risk of comparison with the Head of John the Baptist, severed from the body, which appears in the air to the guilty imagination of Herod, in Gustave Moreau's dramatic picture. Mr. Sargent's very daring and direct portrait of Lord Wemyss, in some respects the most striking portrait of the Exhibition, does not altogether escape such a comparison. Features naturally endowed with most vivacity and play of expression are becoming a positive disadvantage, compared with the solid and less lively cast, in securing the more perfect portrait from the artistic standpoint. Nevertheless, such well-known portraitists as Sir Luke Fildes in Mr. Henry Wood's portrait; Mr. Arthur Cope in Mr. Henry's Chaplin's; Mr. Oulless in Mr. Alfred Pope's; Mr. Seymour Lucas in Mr. Walter Hill's; Mr. Solomon in the Prime Minister's, deserve high praise for this very quality of verisimilitude. Other artists contrive to keep the face in its proper plane of importance, without this somewhat too prevalent exaggeration. Among these are Mr. Arthur Cope in his portrait of Sir Charles Holcroft, dressed in a suit of iron-grey clothes and seated in a light-green leather chair; Sir William Orchardson in, perhaps his best portrait for some years, Sir Lawrence Jenkins in his judge's robes; and Mr. Solomon in his small, dark portrait of Mr. Rosenfeld. Mr. Bacon's portrait of Sir Charles Santley is startlingly vivid, agreeably so in that it presents Sir Charles, but also distressingly, in that its extreme realism approaches too near the boundary between art and mimicry. Among portraitists outside the Academy, Mr. Harold Speed exhibits a portrait of Mr. John Burns, and Mr. Blake

Wirgman one of Mr. Adrian Stokes, both of much quiet excellence. Mr. Strang's portrait of Mr. John Masefield must be noticed as more striking than successful. More daring still is Mrs. Swinnerton's portrait of Mrs. Fenwick, obviously the work of a clever artist, but too garish to admit of much congratulation. Neither can another clever artist, Mr. Henry, be much praised for his full-length portrait of Lady Binning and the Countess of Ronaldshay. In fact, women are not very well portrayed this year, the men having the decided advantage.

As regards landscapes and marine pictures, Mr. Alfred East is pleasantly represented by "The Sicilian Wedding" and by "Amberley Bridge," with boats on a slow stream in the foreground and a bridge in the mid plane, shaded by clouds, and hilly fields covered with snow and bounded by red beech-trees, under the winter sunlight, in the distance. Of a similar style is Mr. Gardner Symons's "Snow-Clouds, Bavaria," in which, beyond a shaded foreground, the effect of light on the perpendicular walls of cottages, mere points in the distance, is well contrasted with flat, snow-clad water-meadows. Mr. Walter Donne's "Maritime Alps" is a handsome, romantic landscape, very characteristic of that region, in varied tones, the fuller green of the foreground skilfully separated from the more polychrome tints of the background by a belt of dark trees in the middle plane. Mr. Oliver Hall's "Pont Rouge, Albi," is well composed, in sombre but clear and harmonious tones, though a little marred by uncertainty in the grey of a distant spire on the right. Mr. Davis makes two very interesting and valiant attempts in "Summer Waters," and still better in "A Salmon Pool on the Wye," to catch the exquisite metallic tint which the blue of the sky reflects on the ripples of shallow water, leaving its interstices almost colourless. Mr. Julius Olsson, somewhat recalling Taulow, catches none too vividly the emerald near the crest of sunlit waves, though his drawing is confused, and waves could surely not take the forms which he gives them, without some mild submarine convulsion.

Among the genre pictures one re-discovery is to be made of great interest, the work of Osman Hamdy Bey, who exhibited one picture, "Jeune Emir à l'Etude," in 1906. A Constantinopolitan, he wisely treats Oriental subjects in a manner reminding Englishmen of Lewis. He has the fine Oriental feeling for the harmony of vivid colour more properly Persian than Turkish, and he is capable of a dignified pathos not to be found in Lewis's work. The graduated harmony in his lesser work, "Le Théologien," from the brilliant turquoise wall-tiles, the clear yellow of the figure's silken coat and the gold diapered white cotton of his shirt, through the mother-of-pearl ornaments of the Koran-stand, to the faded hues of the worn prayer-rug on which it stands, could only have been seen by an Oriental; while the material of the highly-glazed wall-tiles is exceedingly skilfully given according to European methods. He fails here in the flesh tints and modelling of the face, but succeeds much better in the figure of his other, finer picture, "Le Tombeau des Enfants." In this it would be difficult to surpass the richness and harmony of his colouring. It is comparable to some of the finest periods of Persian illumination. The full, purplish-ultramarine of the wall-tiles, with their neutral tinted frieze, the brownish madder of the tablets depending from them, the little grey stone tombs, with their decorations in faint colour, the Persian leopard's skin, the clear ochre of the rush-matting, the greyish ochre of the carved entry, with the note of red in the socket of the taper, and of sanguine in the roof of the entry, form a perfect harmony of brilliant contrasts. The materials of the somewhat spoiled tiles, of the stonework, of the rush-matting, and of a covering to one of the tombs are admirably rendered. It is to be hoped that this beautiful and interesting example of hybrid art will not be allowed to leave this country.

A purely European harmony of low tones, silvers and whites also deserves mention, and Miss Catharine Wood's "Silver and Grey," carline thistles, the seeds of the lunaria, and other scarcely tinted winter decorations arranged in a slightly tarnished silver vase. Equally excellent are two other examples of still life: "A Painter's Materials," a brilliant and exceedingly well painted little picture by the same artist; and "Study of Still Life," a collection of books, by Mr. George Atkinson.

Mr. Sargent's decorative design, "Israel and the Law," is not seen to advantage, since it is presumably intended to be architecturally framed in stone, and is now flanked on either side by full-length portraits of fashionable women. Its decorative quality is not at first sight very apparent, but it develops on further examination. The figure of the Deity seated, bending forward with Titanic, down-stretched arms, and the face reverently concealed under a cowl falling forward, is a fine idea, which might have been suggested by William Blake. But Mr. Sargent's most charming and characteristic work is a small procession of young girls, partly muffled in pale-tinted cashmere shawls, and entitled "Cashmere." The treatment is both broad and delicate, and the composition exceedingly simple. It is, indeed, but for its finish, rather a study than a picture, yet it shows Mr. Sargent in epitome at his very best.

DOMAINS OF BEELZEBUB

Malaria and Greek History. By W. H. S. JONES, M.A.; with The History of Greek Therapeutics and the Malaria Theory. By E. T. Withington, M.A., M.B. (The Manchester University Press, 5s. net.)

MR. JONES's first book, "Malaria," was carefully considered, from the professional standpoint, in THE ACADEMY for the 29th of August, 1908, and it is only necessary here to note in detail the contents of the present larger issue, and to point out one or two of its improvements and additions. It contains—a Preface: an Introduction with Addenda: Chapters on Malaria (1) in modern Greece, with its effects upon the inhabitants; (2) in the ancient non-medical, and (3) medical writers; and (4) the extent of its prevalence and its effects on the ancient Greeks: a first Appendix on Greek home-life and the position of women possibly affected by its increase; a second on the other chief Greek diseases: a Conclusion: a Bibliography: an Essay by Dr. E. T. Withington on the History of Greek Therapeutics and the Malaria Theory: and an Index with special references to the ancient authorities.

Mr. Jones alludes in his Preface to the possible objection that his theory—the practical importation of malaria into Greece during the fifth century before Christ—cannot be true unless it be proved that it did not exist there earlier. He points out that, were such proofs forthcoming, they would not affect his theory. He quotes a passage from Major Ronald Ross's "Report on the Prevention of Malaria in Mauritius" already alluded to in THE ACADEMY review, to the effect that unless a large number of mosquitoes become infected and the localities and patients are in a condition favourable for the culture of the parasites, malaria, though existent sporadically, would not become epidemic, and would tend to disappear without trace, until the conditions were rendered more favourable to its development by the increase in infected immigrants. Mr. Jones seems to argue that the ingress of foreign traders into Attica during the fifth century had an effect in stimulating malaria similar to the advent of settlers to Mauritius, though in the latter case its introduction to soil until then virgin of it, has been more quickly and evidently deadly.

Dr. Withington's Essay is particularly interesting to laymen for its insistence on the scientific corroboration of the traditional eminence of Hippocrates. Quoting largely from Professor Theodor Gomperz's "Greek Thinkers," translated by Mr. Laurie Magnus, and from his edition of the περί τρώγης, Dr. Withington points out that the Hippocratic writings in general contain the earliest proclamation of "the gospel of inductive science," and are strikingly modern both in their positive and negative aspects. "Throughout the collection," he continues, "there is the same subordination of drugs to dietetics and general hygiene, the same emphasis on the importance of prognosis and a knowledge of the natural history of diseases, and the same exclusion of the supernatural and priestly element both from theory and practice." Among other Hippocratic modernisms may be mentioned the operation for empyema, which has "met with the approval of eminent modern surgeons," and the recommendation to patients even with acute lung disease, to sleep in the open air. Again, "Hyoscyamus recommended in quartans re-appears as hyoscyamine in one of the latest professional lists of anti-malarial remedies, while Cinquefoil, which Hippocrates administered in tertians is still a popular remedy for agues throughout Europe." Dr. Withington also gives a useful note of the distinction between the Hippocratic system, and the later return to the more hieratic, by remarking that Dioscorides, while recommending cinquefoil also, adds the characteristic injunction that three leaves must be used as the remedy for tertian fevers, and four for quartans, "while the addition of three [or presumably four] crushed spiders in a bag adds greatly to the efficacy." Whether the revival of hieratic medicine was really due to the increase of malaria and the evil moral effects of the disease, as Mr. Jones seems inclined to believe, must be left to further expert investigation. Major Ronald Ross's successes against such common pests as malaria and mosquitoes have aroused the sympathy even of the unscientific. He has given a permanent new terror to the creatures' hum. But it may interest their victims to learn that the den of the disease which they spread was indicated by Lancisi, reviving the observations of Hippocrates, as early as 1717, and again in 1752 and 1768 by Sir John Pringle and James Lind, physician to the Royal Hospital at Haslar. It must be noted with regret that the Bibliography and Index, although they are presumably supplied by the bibliographers of the Manchester University Press, are inadequate, owing to the stupid habit now common of omitting the "christian" names of authors. Since there are some three dozen writers of the name of Pringle and Lind, and two physicians of the same period named James Lind, some ten learned Gomperz, and a legion of learned Kühn, it is not sufficient to index the surname if any useful purpose is to be served. As regards "Kühn" in particular, who is quoted perpetually throughout this volume, there is no indication whatever how his work is to be discovered. Some of the references appear to be to "Inoculation Against Malaria," Mr. H. A. Nesbitt's translation from Philalethes Kühn, and others not. Whoever is responsible for these omissions had better explain them, for they seriously detract from the utility of the Index and Bibliography, and are not to be expected in a publication of the Manchester University Press.

The recent action of the Hellenic Government in establishing a government monopoly in quinine, in order to insure its purity, mentioned with approval by Mr. Jones, will commend itself to the most ardent individualist. But the sceptical will wonder whether the Hellenic Government will distinguish itself by resisting the temptation to make a profit, and will actually supply the drug as pure as it pretends to. If it does so, it will do much to justify its claims over greater Greece.

Major Ronald Ross's dealings with mosquitoes and Professor Robert Koch's with the tsetse and surra also suggest to the curious layman the question, whether the devotion to Baalzebub of the Akronite dwellers in the Philistinian compagna was prompted by malaria and kindred diseases. Though Ekron is supposed to have received its compliment of Anakim settlers in the time of Joshua, the race seems to have quickly degenerated. The inhabitants seem to have suffered more than the other Philistines while they were keeping the ark of Israel, and after that period to have supplied to history neither persons nor events.

STUDIES IN MIND

Psychology and Crime. By HUGO MÜNSTERBERG.
(Unwin.)

WITHIN recent years psychology, which at one time was perhaps the most haphazard and least regulated of studies, has taken its place as an acknowledged science, with well-defined rules, recognised departments and efficient laboratories in many universities, and professors whose names have become world-famous as exponents of the wonderful inner mechanism of the human mind. In its progress many comfortable platitudes have been disintegrated, many shams exposed, many false conclusions built upon unstable hypotheses demolished. Astronomers bothered at the slight discrepancies of their minute observations and calculations, came to the psychologist's workshop to investigate the rapidity of impressions and reactions, and then "it would not do," says Professor Münsterberg, "to go on claiming that thought is quick as lightning when the experiments of the astronomers had proved that even the simplest mental act is a slow process, the time of which can be measured." Experiments are the basis of this science, actual class-room experiments—much to the surprise of the average man, who often imagines that psychology is a matter of books and lectures only. In this case, however, although the most delicate and sensitive mechanical instruments are in constant use, the object of the research far transcends that of every other science, for to explore the remotest crannies of the mind of man, to find out how and why and in what time certain thoughts and impulses are generated, how and in what manner the actions consequent to such thoughts and impulses are performed, is, putting it broadly, the aim of the professor's life-work. And most men would be astonished at the results of some of those keen hours of study—astonished to find how frail is the human sense of reliability, how easily the strictest of us may tell a false story when completely trustful that every word we say is the truth and capable of being corroborated. Professor Münsterberg carried out a series of elementary tests with his own students which is of great interest and significance. He showed them a large sheet of white cardboard on which fifty little black squares were pasted in irregular order; exposing it for five seconds, he asked how many black spots were on the sheet. The answers varied between twenty-five and two hundred. Then he exhibited a card which contained only twenty spots. This time the replies ran up to seventy and down to ten:

We had here highly-trained, careful observers, whose attention was concentrated on the material, and who had full time for quiet scrutiny. Yet in both cases there were some who believed that they saw seven or eight times more points than some others saw; and yet we should be disinclined to believe in the sincerity of two witnesses, of whom one felt sure that he saw two hundred persons in a hall in which the other found only twenty-five.

He next asked for the number of seconds which elapsed between two loud clicks which were actually separated by ten seconds. The answers varied between half a second and sixty, a large proportion of the students giving forty-five seconds. When the interval was reduced to three seconds, replies ranged from half a second to fifteen, in spite of the fact that the students knew beforehand that they were to estimate the time which passed between the sounds:

The variations would probably have been greater still if the question had been put to them after hearing the sound without previous information; and yet a district attorney hopes for a reliable reply when he enquires of a witness, perhaps of a cabman, how much time passed by between a cry and the shooting in the cab.

Again, the members of the class were requested to describe the sound they would shortly hear, and to state what caused it. The professor immediately struck a large tuning-fork, concealed from their view. Two men out of a hundred recognised the sound as that of a tuning-fork; others took it for the note of a bell, an organ-pipe, a muffled gong, a brass instrument, a horn, a violin, a steam whistle, a human voice, etc., and in describing its tone denoted it as soft, mellow, humming, deep, dull, solemn, resonant, penetrating, full, rumbling; but then, again, as rough, sharp, whistling, and so on:

Again I insist that every one knew beforehand that he was to observe the tone, which I announced by a signal. How much more would the judgments have differed if the tone had come in unexpectedly?—a tone which even now appeared so soft to some and so rough to others—like a bell to one and like a whistle to his neighbour.

The material of another test consisted of white cards with ink-spots somewhat fantastically arranged. These were shown for two seconds, and the suggestion was made that the rough ink "drawings" represented something in the outer world. The definitions given were surprising in their comprehensiveness—soldiers in a valley, grapes, a palace, a river bank, foliage, a rabbit, a town with towers, rising storm, hair in curl-papers, a china plate, a harvest scene, an elephant. These are but a few out of the list. Other fascinating ordeals the students went through for the benefit of humanity, but we must refrain from more quotations.

The notes of these class-room experiments are, of course, not the main feature of the book; they are adduced in an introductory chapter, and only lead up to the more serious and important questions which form its chief purpose. Psychology, the one science which could assist most reasonably in the disentangling of complicated legal and criminal matters, is the one which seems to be entirely neglected, and it is with the object of bringing forward a few preliminary arguments in favour of its adoption that this treatise has been written. It is confessedly composed in a popular and easily comprehended style, free from technicalities or abstruse statements, and Professor Münsterberg is engaged on a more exhaustive work concerning applied psychology which may serve adequately as a basis for actual trial should the authorities ever decide that psychological support is admissible, for instance, in a difficult murder case. It occurs to us that there is a great deal to be said for this point of view now that the study of the mind has reached such a pitch of exactness, especially considering the recurrence of unsolved crimes in our modern life—it is possible that many of the famous mysteries which will now be for ever dark might have been cleared up had an expert and impartial psychologist been allowed to examine the witnesses and suspects. The author treats of many things in this connection: the serious perturbation and consequent unreliability of a nervous witness, caused by his unusual surroundings; the ease with which a clever lawyer can "suggest" an answer favourable to his own side of the case; the nature of the juryman's outlook under the stress of the trial, and so on. There is also an acute discussion in a concluding chapter on the relationship of hypnotism to criminality, and the feasibility of its employment as a help to investigation. "It is not criminals that are 'born,'" says Professor Münsterberg, "but men with poorly working minds," and, taken in time, the training of the mind predisposed to weakness and easily influenced is one of the surest methods of preventing crime. The book is most instructive, interesting, and thought-compelling, and we await the distinguished author's more expansive volume with anticipations of more than usual pleasure.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Flying Months. By FRANCES M. PEARD. (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.)

THE contrasts between the natures of two women forms the dominant note of this ingenious story—the one a widow, young, pretty, heartless and an incorrigible flirt, the other one of those straight, clear-eyed, lovable persons who are often passed over for more exciting company by even the best men. The scene of the action lies for a third of the book in England, a third in Italy, and a third in India, approximately; but there is no crude or sudden "lifting" of the characters from one place to another as though they were mere puppets—all the changes evolve naturally from preceding situations. Cordelia, the fine, true, and resolute girl, forced by circumstances to make her way in the world, takes a position as governess and companion in the house of Nesta Hastings, a school friend of former days, now a widow with two children, and the difference in their ideas of honour and their outlook on life leads to a continual state of friction; this discomfort reaches its climax in the weeks that follow the appearance of a previous lover of Cordelia, who rather meanly transfers his allegiance to Nesta, the more brilliant of the two. On the disturbances which ensue, and the story of Elliott's search for traces of his legitimacy in India we need not enlarge; suffice it to say that the plot is cleverly disclosed, and that Cordelia is left within measurable distance of happiness at last.

The Romance of a Nun. By ALIX KING. (Rebman, 6s.)

THERE is an ingenuous quality about this romance which gives it considerable charm, in spite of a certain monotony. It professes to be the "nonsense-book" of a young girl who had taken the vow of seclusion from the world, but whose rebellious spirit proved too strong and too hungry for the pleasures of a larger life to allow her any peace. The pseudo-prisoner with whom she falls in love is an artist—in these cases the man is generally an artist or a writer—who has obtained access to a window that overlooks a part of the convent grounds, and who establishes communication by means of dropped notes, in the portage of which an intelligent dog assists materially. Probable bility is not a strong point of the story, and the characters of the sisters are very vaguely indicated, but the inconsistent course of the thoughts of a young girl's mind, the rise and fall of hope, the conflict between duty and desire are excellently suggested; the chapters contain just that sort of irresponsible mixture of fun and seriousness which a girl under such rules and restrictions might be expected to commit to the secrecy of her book. The ending, told by the man who is chiefly concerned, is death and disappointment, but the reader's interest is held to the last, and an admirable delicacy and restraint are shown where a clumsy hand might easily have made errors in good taste. No particular cleverness is betrayed by this story, but it is harmless and pleasant to read.

Moran of Kildally. By LAUCHLAN MACLEAN WATT. (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)

THIS study of a man who was possessed, body and soul, by alcoholism, and whose benighted conduct overclouded the career of his clever daughter, is strongly reminiscent of Mr. J. M. Barrie's earlier work. We have the groups of village worthies with their comments in broad Scotch dialect on matters mundane or heavenly; the old schoolmaster, and his joyous self-congratulation over the scholars who have gone forth to make a name in the world; the bright girl who goes to college, and so on. There is nothing particularly distinguished about the book, although the story itself cannot be said to lack interest. The dialect to which we have alluded is a little too freely used—unnecessary harassment is caused by the sudden incursion of a speech such as the following:

"Yes," said the Doctor, "I heard you as I passed the inn. Ye were thrang wi' a wheen cuddies yonder. I heard them snichering."

It is true there is a glossary appended, but to turn to it occasions needless bother when the reader wants to get on with the story in a straightforward manner. Once or twice the conversations between the cronies are quietly amusing:

"Oor man's a great scholar. He was tellin' us last Sabbath about Sodom and Gomorrah, and he said they were twa touns. Dod, d'ye ken, I aye was in the belief they wis man and wife."

The finish of the tale comes with the death of both the hero, Moran (if so pitiful a character can be termed a hero), and his daughter, Elsie, and is written too much in the sentimental vein to reach a high standard of literary value; most readers will be inclined to prefer the opening chapters as more true to life and better in style. In the delineation of "Joseph, the Dreamer," the author is at his best, and very successful.

Side-Tracks and Bridle-Paths. By LIONEL JAMES (Intelligence Officer). (Blackwood, 6s.)

ALTHOUGH this volume embodies the relation of many detached episodes it does not come under the category of the usual collection of short stories, for the narratives are nearly all personal experiences which have to do either with recent events in war-history or with happenings that are familiar to most Englishmen; and we may say at once that not often does so entertaining a budget come into our hands.

In the first portion of the book the author relates some exciting occurrences in Persia, chiefly at or round the city which has quite lately made itself known through our daily papers—Tabriz. It was no easy matter to get away from the place at the time of his visit. Driving to the Julfa Road, with four horses abreast, things became lively:

Suddenly puffs of smoke broke out from the loopholes and rippled along the whole line. This sounds very awful, especially as we were only thirty yards away. But it must be remembered that the Shah's soldiery, then in garrison at the bridge, was the Marand Regiment, which is composed of men only introduced quite recently to their uniforms and rifles. These said rifles are ancient Berdams, which upon discharge develop a prodigious kick. Therefore, the Shah's soldiers when they fire shut their eyes very tightly and murmur a prayer to Allah. Allah as a consequence takes the bullets high, and they sang over our heads like a flight of wild duck.

The next stories of the collection deal with India, and "The Discouragement of Surendra Nath Mukerji"—a tale of the downfall of a blatant native barrister—is the best of these. Russia, South Africa, Turkey, are also laid under contribution, and a couple of English articles conclude the book—these are surprisingly poor in quality after the foregoing brilliant pages. But the account of the progress of three friends who decided to take a motor-car across Germany, with the object of seeing the manœuvres in Silesia, is the raciest and best written sketch in the whole group. Beginning with the hundred formalities and complications of getting the car past the German customs, and continuing with various breakdowns and mishaps on the road, it is bright, with a touch of genuine comedy throughout, and the reader who finishes it without a series of broad smiles and a feeling of having been put en rapport with the luckless travellers will be either a confirmed neurotic or a hopeless pessimist. With the exception of the two articles previously mentioned we can recommend this book with a great deal of pleasure.

The Heart of Scotland. Painted by SUTTON PALMER. Described by A. R. HOPE MONCRIEFF. (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d.)

THE "colour-book" is now an established feature of the publishing-lists, and must be accepted, we suppose, as an indication that as we grow older the taste for looking at pictures, which originated in certain "indestructible" and lurid prints in nursery-days, remains and develops. Our hoardings and spare walls are crammed indiscriminately with flaming posters for the benefit of those whose artistic education is hypothetical—the psychology of the poster would form an interesting study; our novels are sometimes decorated with strange and wonderful pages supposed to represent scenes in the story; and the window of a newspaper-shop, wherever it be, is a conglomeration of atrocities in the way of cheap printing which is of dire significance to the student of the populace. What necessity for thought is saved to the man in the street when for a penny he can purchase the pictures which tell him the news!

Fortunately, however, the colour-books which have won their way into public favour of recent years stand on a different and much higher plane, and are usually supported by literary matter of an excellent quality. This is especially true of the one before us, which can only receive a favourable verdict from whatever point of view we criticise it. Mr. Hope Moncrieff has taken a portion of the lovely northern country which is complementary to that described in his other volumes, and his little studies of its history, customs and scenery are quite above the average; the humorous note, too, which sounds throughout the whole series, is by no means out of place—it lightens many pages which might otherwise by some readers have been skipped as "dry" or "heavy." Good stories are interspersed, not without their bearing on the Scottish character; we may be permitted to quote one or two without trespassing unduly on the author's store:

One of the early emigrants to the Southern States of America is said to have rigged out all his negroes in kilts and such-like, teaching them also to speak Gaelic and to pipe and reel among cotton fields and cane swamps. But when one of these blackamoor retainers, liveried in a kilt, was sent to meet a practically-minded countryman landing from Scotland the effect of so transmogrified a figure proved appalling. "Hae ye been long oot?" stammered the newcomer, and took his passage back by the next ship.

Replying to a certain Italian writer who compares the Tiber with the Tay, and has seen a bare-legged boy wading the Tay above Perth bridge to pick up pebbles, the author says:

Being unable to refute his main contention I would have him know that this laddie was probably risking wet breeks at low tide in search of pebbles, but of pearls, sometimes picked up here; that a bridge would naturally be built near a ford; and that a mile higher up, beyond the tide-flow, the Tay is deep enough to drown boys in its treacherous pools, and might make Julius Caesar himself call for help if he tried swimming across it in spate.

Some tales of the old Perthshire Volunteers are delightful. The author was in charge of a detachment told off on guard-of-honour duty when Queen Victoria visited the city to inaugurate a statue of Prince Albert, and he does not spare himself in his account of the affair:

During the hours of uncertainty officers of rank kept galloping to and fro, to whom I was uncertain whether or no I should pay military compliments. I asked my colonel, who was as much at a loss as myself. Then I consulted the staff-sergeant on whom I depended as my coach, and his advice struck me as full of wisdom: "I don't know what the practice is, sir, but it would be safer to do it too much than too little." So I began presenting arms to every cocked hat that came by, and as I could never be quite sure whether this or that one had been already saluted our rifles were going up and down all the morning like the keys of a piano. Afterwards I learned that the Sovereign's guard should ignore any other personages.

Lengthy chapters are devoted to "The Macgregors" and "Rob Roy and his Sons," but we can spare no space to give samples of their quality. The illustrations, as we have already hinted, are exceedingly good; in their suggestions of atmosphere and distance they are more than usually effective; the only complaint we feel justified in making is that two or three of them incline to the conventional, such as "A Highland Cottage" and "Autumn in the Highlands"; these are rather too reminiscent of the stereotyped scenes which grocers of discernment have adopted to grace their annual almanacks. For the rest, they are as fine examples of the art of reproduction in colour as we have yet seen in books of this category.

A History of Art. By DR. G. CAROTTI. Translated by BERYL DE ZOETE. Vol. 2. The Middle Ages. (Duckworth and Co., 5s. net.)

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH'S English edition of Dr. Giulio Carotti's comprehensive history is likely to prove an exceedingly useful book of reference. It is a pity that the use of so many series of notation makes it at first sight difficult to discover how far their edition has arrived in Dr. Carotti's work. This is Messrs. Duckworth's second volume out of four, and represents the first part of Dr. Carotti's second volume, all that he had issued at the date of Miss Beryl de Zoete's translation. There is no objection to the rendering of the original into English by different translators, and Mrs. Arthur Strong's revision, whether it applies to the text or to the bibliography alone, as Miss Zoete seems to imply, would render Dr. Carotti's work more valuable. But since Mrs. Strong and Dr. Carotti are both authorities on the subject, it should appear clearly where one ends and the other begins. This is not the case in the present volume; there is no sign, for instance, who is responsible for the notes, nor whether Mrs. Strong has overcome the difficulties, and even impossibilities, mentioned by Miss Zoete, in verifying all Dr. Carotti's references, or whether she has merely omitted those which she could not verify. However, the bibliography, as it stands, is abundantly clear and adds greatly to the utility of the volume.

With regard to Dr. Carotti, it must be remembered that his work is "elementary and introductory in its intention" and does not "claim to have covered all the artistic phenomena evolved within the limits of his period." It is, as Miss Zoete again well describes it, "a panorama," intended to give a general view of the history of art, to stimulate further research, and to supply a list of accessible works on the subject. Dr. Carotti cannot, therefore, be justly blamed for offering little criticism, for it is not his object; nor that the little which he does offer is uncritically laudatory. If he had omitted all comments, as he might have done for the sake of space, his work would have been condemned as dull, for, after all, it is intended to be read through, and is not only an encyclopædia. His remarks should, therefore, be regarded as emphasising such broad traits of style as immediately strike the spectator; as such they help to impress salient features on the memory of the student and have their obvious use. His comments are, therefore, rather descriptive than critical, positive rather than comparative. He succeeds in creating or recalling characteristics of Neo-Brahminic, Saracenic, Romanesque or Gothic art without comparing their merits or entering upon their relative architectural stability. Such questions should be found by the student answered in the works included in the bibliography.

The present volume is divided into three books. The first, Early Christian Art, contains a chapter on the Catacombs, and a second on the Constantinian basilicas. The second book, Neo-Oriental Art, has a chapter on Byzantine art; a second on Arab art, considered architecturally, locally, and in the minor or industrial forms; a third, on Indian art of the Neo-Brahminic period; and a fourth on Arabo-Indian art. The third book deals with Western or European art in four chapters: the first, Carolingian art, first in Italy and then north of the Alps. The remainder of the book excludes Italy. The second chapter deals with Romanesque art in France, Germany and England; the third with Gothic art in architecture, sculpture, painting, and the minor decorative and industrial forms; and the fourth with the offspring of Gothic art in England, Germany, Flanders, Spain and Portugal. It will thus be evident that in a small volume of a little over three hundred pages, containing also three hundred and fifty illustrations in the text, there is little room for digression.

Miss Beryl de Zoete's translation is generally so clear and good that it deserves the correction of a few slips, or errors of judgment which tend to confusion. The well-known statue at Amiens is really called "le beau dieu," not "le bon dieu." Vienne has got confounded with the capital of Austria and has so slipped out of the Index. The metal altar decoration at St. Ambrogio, Milan, and at St. Mark's, Venice, should never be called—correctly enough—a pall, which suggests funerals, nor a pallium, which suggests the primatial vestment, but distinctively, the pallotto and the pala d'oro, which suggest nothing but themselves. On the other hand, though "the coney is a feeble folk" in proverbs, in accurate description, foliage is only "peopled" with little animals, in Ireland.

The tables of examples are very useful and catch the eye, and most of the little illustrations are wonderfully clear; the volume is, indeed, a model of packed information.

Gervase. By MABEL DEARMER. (Macmillan, 6s.)

THE conflict between the ascetic and the lover of earth has often been taken as a theme by novelists with varying success—it is never uninteresting, and, if handled with the least skill, cannot fail to engender certain grim and uncompromising situations. But to combine these two antagonistic temperaments in one person, to set within a single character the grave, almost monastic spirit of the dreamer and the imperious desires of the repressed body, and to trace the evolution of the soul swung between these fires from boyhood, through a critical adolescence, to manhood and maturity (the terms being not invariably synonymous) is a task less frequently attempted. It is too formidable to appeal to the inexperienced hand, not popular enough for the pen that scratches merely for gold, and demands so fine and so sure a touch that many writers of fiction whom we justly name great might well ponder and hesitate before undertaking it. Among these deterring difficulties Mrs. Dearmar has passed scathless, and succeeded, it is hardly too much to say, brilliantly.

Gervase Alleyne, born of a mother who was frail physically and strong in spiritual faith, son of a father who was an honest materialist, passionate with and yet devoted to his wife, is introduced to us as a baby in a first chapter of charm and insight such as few have excelled—it is fitly entitled "The Psychology of the Baby," and from it we give one or two brief quotations which will show the literary grace of the author's sentences:

A bar of sunlight lay across the ceiling, and the baby stared at it. It pleased him, because it brought with it a sense of familiarity; it had been there before, and the baby had lain in his cradle and had looked at it.

He did not consider the light from an æsthetic point of view, he only recognised in it a condition of things that had been before, and his pleasure lay in the sense of this recognition. He crowed and stretched his limbs luxuriously; by virtue of his memory of it that bar of light belonged to him. The world had been to him until quite lately only a series of recurring impressions; but as they begot in him remembrance he realised himself, and them. He owned his world. He stretched out his limbs to feel his strength, and crowed afresh.

He laughed now, for a great bluebottle had walked suddenly across the bar of sunshine, and he had noticed that before. Seen but dimly the bluebottle struck him as a peculiarly humorous object, made entirely in order to create laughter.

The last passage, describing the father and mother, gives the crux of the matter and suggests the design of the book:

Out of the intermingling of these two lives—the one fundamentally of the earth, the other of the spirit, each eternally opposed to each, and only held together by the attraction of opposites—was born the baby in the cradle. From these two natures, so simple in their essence, so complex in their union, had been evolved a third, a being whose soul must by its very incarnation become the meeting-ground of forces but dimly dreamt of. A facile prophecy, taking into account these antecedents, might well forecast an existence at variance with itself, a thing half God, half brute, yet wholly human.

But the boy, knowing nothing of the projects of Time, lay in his cradle and laughed at the ponderous bluebottle and the bar of sunlight.

Gervase is left an orphan, an intensely lonely child, and his tender little soul is seared in a short school-life until the body revolts and he is sent to his solitary home to be cared for by a tutor. This man, Mark Hassall, happens to be one calculated in every way to bring out the inherited spiritual nature of the boy, and for years one side of life—that of love and passion—is completely shut off. It may be imagined that sooner or later for such a youth the heavens would open blindingly, and that his love-making would be a process at which the gods might hold their breath. The story of Gervase's bewilderment when he discovers his passion for the common little Miriam Soul, knowing her to be stupid and unworthy (and this is what appalls him, for he is introspective to a high degree), is a distinguished literary achievement, fervid without trespassing into eroticism, vivid without becoming fantastic, essentially consistent with the dual nature of the man. The body wins, through the artifices of Miriam, and Gervase marries her; but the marriage is one in name only, and the sin to which Miriam abjectly confesses on the evening of the wedding-day separates them till her death. The real love which had long existed sub-consciously between Kate Soul, Miriam's sister, and Gervase forms the second crucial episode of the book, and the account of Mark Hassall's predominating influence over his former pupil, long after he had attained an age when most men act for themselves, is a psychological study which is of extreme interest, but too dependent on the whole scheme of the story to be suggested by quotation.

The one improbable note which occurs to us in reading this romance is the emphatic difference between the two sisters, Kate and Miriam—one a clever and even famous artist, a woman of grace and delicacy, the other a coarse, half-educated little sloven, with neither good taste nor good manners. Some of Kate's remarks, for instance, betray a capacity for criticism and apt use of language which to her sister would be absolutely incomprehensible, such as her dictum that "A great picture is a picture of the model, a picture of yourself, and a vision thrown in between the two." Such incongruities among families are, perhaps, discoverable in real life, but the point is debatable whether it is possible to introduce so sharp a contrast, having due regard to the reader's sense of reasonableness. We can well pardon the author this lapse, however (if it be one), for the sake of the very fine novel she has given us. Taken purely from the literary standpoint, there is not a careless paragraph in the whole book; judged by the more human standpoint, set by comparison with life and experience, there is scarcely an improbable situation, considering what a battlefield of doubts and fears was the mind of Gervase Alleyne. It is a pleasant duty on our part, and one we could wish for more frequently, to recommend this novel heartily to all our readers who value good work.

HOW THE LAW FAVOURS WOMEN

In this article an attempt will be made, as briefly as the magnitude of the important subject permits, to show some of the numerous advantages enjoyed by women under man-made law and administration. In the first place we shall deal with the criminal law, because here the privileges are overwhelming—the most rampant Suffragette cannot claim that there is any offset for men at all, save, perhaps, that a man who gets a girl into trouble is not indicted with her as an accessory if she murders her illegitimate child, the law not yet recognising such vicarious responsibility. However, in considering the question of the abduction of a girl under eighteen, or the seduction of a girl under sixteen, by the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885—which the Feminists would like to see strengthened in favour of women—the whole responsibility is thrown by the law on the man's shoulders: he is involved in serious penalties; while the female, although she may be several years older and the inciting party, gets off scot free. This is all the more unjust when you consider, say, that a girl approaching sixteen is often practically a woman, whilst a boy of the same age, for instance, is never more than a child.

But it is when women commit crime that the law becomes so peculiarly tender on their behalf. Since 1831 no female can be flogged under any consideration, whereas men are often flogged for highway robbery with violence, which women sometimes commit; for criminal assault, which, bad as it is, is no worse than vitriol-throwing; and for prison indiscipline of a gross description, of which viragoes are often guilty.

A wife cannot be convicted of any larceny, burglary, forgery, or for uttering forged notes, if the offence is committed in the presence of her husband, on the presumption that she so acted under the coercion of her husband. This is the kind of legal "presumption" that made Bumble declare the law "a bachelor" and "a hass." We are, of course, aware that the "presumption" can be rebutted, but a certain well-known foreign dancer has very good reason to be thankful that the law requires amazingly strong rebutting evidence. It is on this principle, too, of the greater responsibility of males to females, that the court always acts in allotting punishment where men and women are charged together for the same offence. It seems to be an accepted axiom that the man was the instigating party and committed the greater part of the crime. Even where men and women are charged separately for similar offences there is no comparison in their treatment. Women far more often than men get the benefit of the doubt of a recommendation to mercy, and of the First Offenders Act, while the sentences of females are invariably on a lower scale. Mr. Belfort Bax, the Socialist writer, has often given examples of this flagrant inequality before the law. He has shown conclusively that whereas if a man kills a woman in a fit of exasperation he is almost invariably hanged, if a woman kills a man in similar circumstances she is almost invariably acquitted on some whining and mendacious plea. He cites one particularly bad case which was heard at the Middlesex Sessions on the 23rd of May, 1894. Here a wife, who had stabbed her husband so that he was lying in a dangerous condition in the hospital, was released on her own recognisances. Her excuse was that she was drunk at the time. The husband was condemned, however, to pay 5s. a week for her support, at which she grumbled, alleging that he could well afford £1 a week. A short time after she came back and again assaulted her husband. She was this time fined a trifling sum with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment!

It must be remembered, too, that female convicts get a remission of a month more a year than male for good conduct, and have not to report themselves similarly on release, an official actually visiting them at their residences for that purpose. Nor is the prison treatment at all similar. No woman can be forced to sleep on a plank-bed, neither is she given any of those degrading, useless and heart-breaking tasks to perform of which we have heard so much in reference to masculine prisoners. Further, although it is customary to put Socialists and others sent to prison for more or less technical and political offences in the Third Division, an exception is made in the case of Suffragettes who are incarcerated in the Second Division, and that under modified conditions.

But to return to the criminal law. Since 1895, when the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act was passed, a woman cursed with a drunken or brutal husband can obtain a separation on proving ill-treatment at a police court, and compel him to contribute a sum not exceeding £2 a week for her support. She is also given legal custody of any children under sixteen. Men have no equivalent for this, save that under Sub-section 2 of Section 5 of the Licensing Act, 1902, a husband cursed with a hopelessly drunken wife can get her sent to an Inebriates' Home. Yet surely a man may suffer as much at the hands of a muscular termagant as a woman may suffer at the hands of a ruffianly husband.

Then, to pass to the civil law, there is the Slander of Women Act, 1891. Originally it was a custom confined to Bristol that if a person imputed unchastity to a woman she could bring an action for slander without alleging special damage. Now by this Act a female similarly traduced can bring such an action wherever she lives, but no man can do so unless he is a beneficed clergyman. A woman bringing such an action can certainly recover no more damages than costs unless she has specially suffered, but, at any rate, she has the opportunity of vindicating her character.

"But," someone may remark, "how about the divorce laws?" Well, to start with, no woman, however wealthy, can be made to pay damages and costs as a co-respondent; and frequently when an injured husband obtains damages he either sets them aside for the erring wife's benefit, or in some cases they are sequestered by the court. The husband's privileges are really paper privileges, for the terms "cruelty" and "desertion" are made very elastic for the benefit of a wife; and it must not be forgotten that there is this difference between her misconduct and his: she can introduce an illegitimate child into the household for him to keep.

However, it is when you come to consider the law relating to married women generally that you see how privileged women are and in what a correspondingly disadvantageous position men are placed. A wife can pledge her husband's credit, but he can't pledge hers. If she deserts him and gets an order for restitution of conjugal rights it isn't worth the paper it's written on (Regina v. Jackson). He is jointly responsible civilly for her tortious acts, such as libel (Seroka v. Katzenberg). She can snap her fingers in his face and refuse to do a hand's-turn of work or contribute anything to household expenses or education of children. She is bound to keep husband and children off the rates, if able to do so, and, since the flagrant case of Pontypool Guardians v. Buck called Parliament's attention to the matter, her parents as well. But that is the extent of her obligations. She cannot be sent to prison for debt, nor made a bankrupt unless trading separately, and if there is a restraint on anticipation of her property the court will remove it for her benefit, but not for the benefit of creditors. As for her not being allowed to make a personal profit out of money given her for household expenses, the law can hardly be expected to wink at embezzlement.

We have stated that a married woman is not amenable to the Debtors Act, 1869, by which a person can be imprisoned for contempt of court for refusing to satisfy a judgment order if able to do so. It may be added that spinsters in practice usually enjoy a similar immunity. Judge Rentoul, at the City of London Court in 1906, stated, when asked to commit a female trader to prison, that he never committed a woman debtor, and hoped he never should.

In conclusion, by the provisions of an Act passed last year, policemen and park-keepers may confiscate tobacco found on boys under sixteen, but they have no similar powers in the case of girls.

THE DRINK QUESTION

If we turn to the late Dr. Anstie's well-known work, "Stimulants and Narcotics," we find the following passage in the introduction: "The use in everyday life of these substances is not, as some would have us believe, an outgrowth of modern corruption; on the contrary, it is consecrated by whatever sanction immemorial custom can confer. There is absolutely no period in history, as there is absolutely no nation upon earth, in which we do not find evidence of this custom." Again, Dr. Lockhart Gillespie writes in his "Natural History of Digestion," published in 1898: "It is doubtful if there has ever been in this world a race of men ignorant of the stimulating and exhilarating effects of the products of the fermentation of starch and sugar." Wine and beer are both frequently mentioned in the Ebers Papyrus, 1500 B.C., and it must be remembered that that document probably consists of extracts made from earlier writings, some of which may date as far back as 5000 B.C. To come to the Bible. The "Encyclopædia Biblica" tells us that "With regard to the attitude of the Old Testament to the general question of the use of fermented beverages it is worthy of notice that, while tirōš in the Old Testament sometimes denotes the unfermented must, there is no trace in Hebrew literature, from the earliest period to the close of the Mishna, of any method of preserving it in the unfermented state. . . . Throughout the Old Testament the use of wine as a daily beverage appears as an all but universal custom. Even its use to exhilaration is implicitly approved, whilst the value of alcohol as a stimulant in sickness and distress is explicitly recognised. Summed up in the words of Jesus ben Sira, 'wine drunk in measure and to satisfy is joy of heart and gladness of soul.'" With regard to the New Testament, one quotation alone will suffice to prove that "wine" refers to fermented liquor. The words "neither do men put new wine into old bottles, else the bottles break," etc., would be meaningless unless fermentation were implied. It is drunkenness and gluttony that are condemned in the Old and New Testament, but not wine-drinking and meat-eating, as our modern cranks make out. In fact, any intelligent student of the Bible might well say, with the late Professor Blackie, that the man who dines you but does not wine you is neither a Christian nor a gentleman. Dean Hole evidently held the same opinion. A recent writer has called attention to the fact, so carefully avoided by teetotal fanatics, that history shows that the only nations making any mark in the world are the drinking nations, and that the abstinent races occupy the position of "bottom dog." Furthermore, the ancient Greeks were no mean wine-drinkers, and they could think and express their thoughts too, and the German, whose philosophy, when it dies, goes to Oxford, seldom retires for the night until either wine or beer has given him the richtige Bettischeure. There is no exaggeration in the statement that teetotalism, which really has nothing whatever to do with temperance, is one of the most noxious of the many obsessions that are nowadays rushing us along the "downgrade." There is more all-round harm done by faddism than by drink. From a strictly scientific point of view alcohol should, perhaps, be placed among the heavy narcotic poisons, and does, when habitually over-indulged in, produce far-reaching evils; but if it were only half as injurious as some modern pathologists make out, the Northerners would have disappeared long ago. Alcoholic insanity, about which we hear so much nowadays, is a disease that appears in persons who are predisposed to the neuroses, and who have drunk to excess, and it is not so much the alcohol itself as the adulterants by means of which it is "faked" into favour that cause the majority of the cases of neuritis ascribed to alcoholism. So it is with other diseases usually attributed to a fervent worship of Bacchus. Cirrhosis of the liver does occur without alcoholism, and if the latter always produced the former the average Scotsman would, indeed, be in a parlous state. When Krupp first started his great works at Essen the only stimulant his employees could obtain, at a cheap rate, was a vile kind of Schnapps, and the mortality amongst the workers was high and their productiveness low; but directly the great iron-master provided his men with good beer the death-rate sank, and the output rose both in quantity and quality. It is the sophisticated drink that injures even the moderate man. Temperance drinks, too, are not above suspicion, and one can well understand what Lord George Hamilton meant when he said that the only time he ever felt the worse for drink was after attending a teetotal banquet. In Berlin drinking is general and deep, but drunkenness is not common, and the Prussian capital is an example of sobriety to many cities in Britain. Saturday, Sunday, and Monday are not respectively Boozeday, Gorgeday, and Pawnticket-and-ginday with the Berlin as they are with the London working classes. Holidays, too, throughout Germany are times of genuine enjoyment, and the German Ausflüge, or excursions into the country, never terminate in the filthy orgies that mark so many English beanfeasts. Mr. James Pollard, who has studied the Berliners, says: "The people are satisfied with light drinks, which they can use in large quantities without intoxication. It is a consequence, partly of education, partly, perhaps, of military discipline, but chiefly of the aversion to what is useless, which is a dominant quality of the modern German mind, that the people are so self-controlled." In the opinion of the present writer, military discipline is the chief factor, for it has become both national and domestic discipline. In consequence of this, German brats do not smoke, and German women do not go on a "gin-crawl" or "bar-loaf" with their children. A well-known authority has computed that 60 per cent. of all cases of habitual inebriety owe their origin to some hereditary taint, the parents of the victims having been drunkards, or insane, or mentally defective, or rheumatic, gouty or consumptive, or afflicted with some more or less constitutional infirmity. In 20 per cent. of the cases the same authority traces history of injury or disease immediately preceding the abuse of alcohol. In 10 per cent. brain or nerve exhaustion was found to be the forerunner of habitual inebriety, whilst insanitary dwellings, bad surroundings and insufficient or improper food accounted for 5 per cent., thus leaving only a small proportion to be classified as "obscure" or "unknown."

Taking all the above facts into consideration, one cannot be surprised that prohibition has proved such a ludicrous failure as a preventive of drunkenness. Indeed, it is only in an age of fads, of sickly sentimentalism and maudlin cant, that legislation against drunkenness could be seriously proposed. Just as reasonably might one try to put down lunacy, rheumatism or earthquakes by Act of Parliament—in fact, the suggestion is only on a par with the famous Chinese Imperial Mandate forbidding the recurrence of an eclipse. Drunkenness cannot be looked on as a crime, any more than gluttony; it is a purely personal matter—a weakness, a misfortune, a sin, according to the light in which we may choose to view it—but the mere fact of getting drunk can no more constitute an offence against society than does the abuse of tobacco, or a surfeit of plum-pudding. The faddist may urge that under the influence of drink a man is more liable to crime, but this contention is altogether beside the mark; moreover, it is an indubitable fact that the real, hardened, hopeless criminal is rarely, if ever, an habitual or even an occasional drunkard. The fallacy of attempting to establish a connection between drunkenness and crime, or between drunkenness and disease, has been crushingly exposed by the celebrated Dr. Duclaux, who has shown that the worst, the most diabolical, crimes are invariably planned and perpetrated by individuals in the full exercise of their reasoning powers, and for whom no excuse of mental aberration can be urged. There is no attempt on the part of the present writer to hold a brief for drunkenness; it is a curse to the individual just as is every other sin of material self-indulgence, and as such should be discouraged and fought against. But it is as absurd, and as contrary to all principles of law and justice, to punish a drunkard as such, as it would be to punish the man who injures his constitution by smoking too many cigarettes, or by a too luxurious table. It is only when the influence of drink renders him a nuisance or a danger to his fellow-men that they have any right to interfere. Still more ludicrous is the attempt to restrict or prevent the moderate use of alcohol, on account of the excesses in which some indulge. The fanatics of teetotalism apparently hold—with vegetarians and kindred cranks—that some peculiar virtue resides in the abstinence from some special form of food or drink. To all but the devotees of the sect such a pretension can only appear childish. It is discipline that we want, not inhibitory legislation.

LINNEAN SOCIETY OF LONDON.

GENERAL MEETING, 1ST APRIL, 1909.

DR. D. H. SCOTT, F.R.S., President, in the chair.

The minutes of the general meeting of the 18th March, 1909, were read and confirmed.

Miss Mary Rathbone, Mr. James Montagu Francis Drummond, B.A., and Dr. Marie Charlotte Carmichael Stopes, were admitted Fellows.

Mr. Henry Caracciolo, F.E.S., C.M.Z.S., Mr. John Beavis Groom, and Dr. Anstruther Abercrombie Lawson, were elected Fellows.

Dr. Marie Stopes exhibited several microscope slides and micro-photographs of plant petrifications from Japan. The petrifications are of Cretaceous age, and are preserved as masses of fragments in some degree like the palæozoic "coal-balls." The specimens included a number of new genera and species whose structure throws light on the flora of the Cretaceous period, and in particularly is important in relation to the question of the early Angiosperms. These specimens are the first to be worked on from these beds.

The President congratulated Miss Stopes in the name of the Society, on the successful and important results of her journey and explorations.

Prof. F. W. Oliver and Mr. E. A. Newell Arber joined in the discussion which followed.

Mr. A. D. Darbishire exhibited seven cases of specimens as the results of breeding experiments with peas, illustrating Mendelian Phenomena, and Mr. Arthur W. Sutton showed a large series of seeds, some being results obtained by crossing Pisum arvense from the neighbourhood of Jaffa, in Palestine, with varieties of culinary peas, P. sativum.

Prof. Keeble and Mr. J. R. Drummond contributed further remarks, and the exhibitors replied.

The first paper was presented by Mr. A. O. Walker, entitled "Amphipoda Hyperideæ of the 'Sealark' Expedition to the Indian Ocean." He explained that the Amphipoda Hyperideæ of the "Sealark" expedition consist of 35 species in 28 genera, none new to science. Scina borealis, G. O. Sars, has not previously been found in tropical seas. Most of the specimens were taken in open tow-nets, so the actual depth at which they occurred is uncertain, but an ovigerous female of Platyscelus armatus (Claus) was taken "off sounding-lead" at 209 fathoms, which shows that this species deposits its ova on the bottom.

Mr. Walker also showed specimens of Amphipoda preserved for 26 years in pure glycerine, the colour and markings being perfectly retained.

He concluded by offering for the acceptance by the Society a microscope by E. Leitz of Wetzlar, fitted with three powers and Abbé's condenser.

The President moved a special vote of thanks to the donor for his generous and welcome gift, which was carried by acclamation.

Dr. J. Cosmo Melvill gave an outline of the contents of his memoir on the Marine Mollusca of the same expedition. He said that the Marine Mollusca obtained during the Stanley Gardiner expedition of 1905-6 are especially interesting from the standpoint of geographical distribution. Accompanying the catalogue of nearly five hundred species are given tables of comparison with the Molluscan Faunas of nine or ten selected "areæ" of the Great Indo-Pacific region; one curious result of the investigation being that whereas many are identical with species found in Polynesia, or even Japan, the reverse obtains when comparison is made with the more contiguous fauna of the Persian gulf and North Arabian Sea. This last has been made the subject of special study during the past fourteen years and a total of nearly seventeen hundred species chronicled, of which something like five hundred proved new to science. Only one of these new forms (Peristernia corallina Melv.) has been found to occur in the Stanley Gardiner collections, made in the more southern portions of the same ocean, and comparatively few of the better known forms are identical. Indeed, the affinities of this collection are, as might be expected, Mauritian.

The Rev. T. R. R. Stebbing and Prof. Dendy added a few observations, and the author replied.

A paper by Mr. E. R. Sykes on the Land and Freshwater Mollusca of the Seychelles Archipelago was formally read, the following abstract giving a summary of the report.

The author gives an account of the land and freshwater shells collected by Mr. Stanley Gardiner in the Seychelles Islands. Nearly all the known forms are included in the collection, and three species belonging to Ennea (2) and Prioniscus (1) are described as new. A table showing the inter-insular distribution is given and a list of all known forms. The origin of the fauna is uncertain, but the islands have evidently been for some considerable period separated from the mainland.

The last paper was by Dr. W. T. Calman on a blind prawn from the Sea of Galilee, constituting a new genus and species, Typhlocaris galilea.

The author briefly replied to questions put by Mr. A. O. Walker and the Rev. T. R. R. Stebbing.

The next general meeting will be held on the 6th of May, 1909, at 8 p.m.

CORRESPONDENCE

A REPLY TO THE "OLD FIRM" IN PUBLISHING.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—We have read with a good deal of interest your scathing criticism of the Publishers' Circle in general, and the Young Publishers in particular, and as we are one of the youngest publishers in the field, we trust you will allow us to reply on behalf of those young publishers to whom we have the honour to belong. In the first place, let us say that we ourselves demur to the suggestion that we are knocking at the door of the literary agent and the author. We think we might rather say that the literary agent and the author are knocking at the door of the Young Publishers—whether it is that they are dissatisfied with the old firm, and hope for better things from the new we do not venture to determine. Be that as it may, we have had no lack of offers from authors known and unknown, and we have had a good percentage of the rejected rubbish of London hurled at our head in addition.

We hold no brief for the "Book Monthly," though we recognise it as a valuable asset to the publishing world, and we are quite prepared to admit that the Young Publisher is not going at once to set up a new standard for literary work; he must walk before he can run; but it seems to us that you overstep the mark when you say that: "In the hands of the Young Publisher English literature cannot exist." It is instructive on this point to compare some of the early lists with the recent lists of a few of the "old" firms. Almost invariably it will be discovered that there has been a progressive improvement in the quality of the literary work put forth. One would almost imagine from your article that the Old Firm was born old. Now, even admitting that your strictures on this point were entirely justified, we contend that the Young Publisher of to-day has as high ideals as the Young Publisher of yesterday, though, like the Old Firm in its youthful days, he may not be able at once to realise his ideals. Another fact must be borne in mind. It is not inherently impossible that the "Young Publisher" who has spent the best twenty years or so of his life with the "Old Firm"—as have several of the Young Publishers—should have imbibed some of the great traditions of the famous old publishing houses, and should strive to emulate the best models in his own business. Of course, the Young Publisher, like other men of business, looks at publishing from a commercial standpoint, and no doubt in his early days he is apt to regard everything saleable as grist for the mill; he cannot afford to be so exclusive as the Old Firm, because he would never become an "Old Firm" himself if he were. "Keep the mill grinding," must be his motto. But when it is asserted that "his 'Successes' are invariably and without exception based on material which is a disgrace to letters," we can only hold up our hands and say, to adapt the words of the famous Flaxman, "Give us time, and we will yet produce works that THE ACADEMY will be proud to recognise," to say nothing of the "Yellow" Press!

Youth, however, is not to be judged by length of days. As Bacon says, "A man may be old in hours though young in years, if he have lost no time." Many of the Young Publishers have shown a vigour and progressive spirit which are likely to entitle them before long to rank with the "old" firms, and a comparison of their lists with the early lists of many of the old-established firms will show that there is a much higher percentage of sound literature in the lists of the Young Publishers of to-day.

The rest of your letter seems to apply quite as much to the "Old Firm" as to the new. It is, moreover, hardly fair to tar all the Young Publishers with the same brush. Of course, there may be unscrupulous and unprincipled young publishers, as probably there are also publishing houses long established who have thriven on the gullibility of authors, but it is our belief that as a body the Young Publishers are aiming to realise the best traditions of the past. We speak only for ourselves when we say that it is open for any of our authors to inspect our books during office hours. May we also add that we have many letters in our possession which prove that friendliness and mutual understanding between author and publisher is no chimera. The Young Publisher may be only a shrewd business man, but we hope he is too shrewd not to see that the author's loss is not necessarily the publisher's gain. He ought to realise, and we think he does realise, that to bankrupt the author is not the surest way to success in the publishing field. He ought to perceive, and we think he does perceive, that the greatest successes have been won by those houses who are noted for their honourable dealing. Speaking for ourselves, it will be the endeavour of this firm to follow in their steps, combining up-to-date business methods with the time-old principles of honesty, integrity, and fair dealing.

Much of the misunderstanding between authors and publishers arises simply from the fact that each views the subject from a different standpoint, and the author, having no practical experience of publishing, is unable to understand the view-point of the publisher. We ourselves have had authors approach us with ridiculous and most unworkable suggestions, and we have personal knowledge of many instances of authors asking for advances, which there was not the remotest likelihood that their books would ever earn. The author has never professed to be a business man, and without bandying accusations of dishonest intentions, it is a fact that he does only too frequently over-estimate the real monetary value of his work, and the publisher, not being a philanthropist by profession, must test the author's merits first of all from a commercial standpoint. Publishing necessarily involves an element of risk, a percentage of all publishing ventures must necessarily partake of the nature of gambles, and the publisher who does not allow a fair margin of profit even on the works of authors of established reputation will soon be neither old, nor young, nor middle-aged. We therefore say, long live the Publishers' Circle, and we would close by repeating our offer that we are willing for any of our authors to inspect our books at any time during office hours.

STANLEY PAUL & Co.

WILLIAM BLAKE AND A THEORY OF VERSE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I do not know whether it has been noted before that there is something of a definite philosophical theory indicated (consciously or unconsciously) in the playful lines which form the "Introduction" to the "Songs of Innocence." A cursory analysis of the lines, however, gives a close parallel to the line of thought indicated by certain passages in "Intentions." Both Blake and the author of "Intentions" touch on the same theme—the evolution of the lyrical expression. Both are closely similar in idea, although Blake's naive narration might gain acceptance where the prose statement might be rejected as partaking somewhat of wilfulness.

Blake's lines run as follow:—

INTRODUCTION.

Piping down the valleys wild,
Piping songs of pleasant glee,
On a cloud I saw a child,
And he laughing said to me:
"Pipe a song about a Lamb!"
So I piped with merry cheer;
"Piper, pipe that song again;"
So I piped: he wept to hear.
"Drop thy pipe, thy happy pipe;
Sing thy songs of happy cheer!"
So I sang the same again,
While he wept with joy to hear.
"Piper, sit thee down and write
In a book that all may read."
So he vanished from my sight;
And I plucked a hollow reed,
And I made a rural pen,
And I stained the water clear,
And I wrote my happy songs
Every child may joy to hear.

Thus it is that he tells us whence the writing of the "Songs." First, the pure music of the "pipe," then the suggestion of a theme, then the wordless music of the theme, then the "singing" of the songs, and last of all, the writing of them. How closely is this succession allied with the passages in "Intentions" concerning the artist who conceives "certain modes of music and methods of rhyme," to whom "the mere form suggests what is to fill it and make it intellectually and emotionally complete"—even as the pure music of the "piping" suggested the theme—to Blake's little listening child. And in the suggestive lines of Blake where the songs are first sung, and then by virtue of their pleasing cadence (and not until then) are written, in this noticeable sequence, we are reminded of the words of eulogy in the Greek method—the test "always the spoken word in its musical and metrical relations." And it was the sense that this sequence so definitely traced out by Blake was so often reversed that prompted the spirited protest against "the tendency in literature to appeal more and more to the eye and less and less to the ear . . . which, from the standpoint of pure art, it should seek to please, and by whose canons of pleasure it should abide always."

It may have been that Blake had no definite consciousness of enunciating a "theory." It may have been that he had never even mentally formulated one. Still, his own verses would suggest such a method, and the parallel indicated in the foregoing is even the more noteworthy assuming that Blake's tendencies in this matter were instinctive rather than deliberate.

SOME BOOKMAKERS AND THEIR METHODS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Having noticed that you called attention, a little time ago, in the pages of THE ACADEMY, to the scope and possibilities within the reach of unscrupulous bookmakers (I mean the betting bookmaker, not the literary bookmaker), and knowing your usual love for fair play in all matters, whether they be literary, sporting, or otherwise, I venture to address to you an account of my painful experience, which clearly shows that some sort of legislation is necessary to protect people from the wiles of the dishonest section of bookmakers.

Last year I unfortunately began betting with some Jewish bookmakers in the belief that they had a trustworthy status. The first week I lost £20; another week I lost £40. I sent them my cheques on the following Mondays. Then I made a double-event bet, taking £1,000 to £5 Yentoi and Marcovil, for the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire. Both horses won, but when I applied for the money I had won I was unable to get it; and I have since been unable to obtain it. They quibbled and contended that I had no receipt—no written contract. But surely everyone knows that in the racing world, on the racecourse, it is the custom to make bets without receipts and vouchers. It has often been said—and truly said—by racing journalists and others, that the tone of trust and commercial morality in betting is much higher than prevails in the City or the Stock Exchange, because in the former world merely a word is necessary to bind men to a contract which often involves thousands of pounds; whereas in the City or Stock Exchange, signed documents have to pass between the parties before the smallest money contract is binding. It is true in many cases, and it is absolutely true in the case of bookmakers of such unimpeachable integrity and repute, as Messrs. Slowburn, Pickersgill, Hibbert, and Goodson, and a few others, who are towers of strength and honour, as the racing world knows, and who would be worthy ornaments in any walks of the higher mercantile world.

But what protection has one got in the cases of scores of lesser bookmakers, who only pay a small loss, but who instantly repudiate a large bet—when they lose?

Either the Jockey Club or the legislation framers in the Houses of Parliament would do well to frame a complete and final code, thereby putting a stop to the loosest and most flagrant methods, which, at the present time, enable the crooked section of bookmakers to wallow in fur coats, motor cars, asparagus out of season, and Corona cigars, and to bask in the Riviera sun, whilst the defeated punter watches the scavengers clear away the snow and slush from the London streets.

ENGLISH QUANTITIES.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—A writer in to-day's ACADEMY speaks of my "rules of quantity." Permit me to explain that, so far from suggesting any, I have all along contended that it is impossible to lay down for English speech any such fixed rules as hold good in classic prosody. That our poets do make some use of quantitative relations between syllables I quite believe; if they did not, either consciously or unconsciously, they would not be getting full value out of their materials. But the predominance of stress-accent in our speech relegates quantity to so subordinate a position that the same syllable can usually be treated as long or short almost at will, and specific rules are for the most part illusory.

Writers of accentual "Sapphics" nearly always fail to make their rhythm sufficiently clear, their accents sufficiently certain. They do not realise that, the metre being unfamiliar and foreign, they must mark it with extra care. Give a non-classical reader such a line as :

Saw the white implacable Aphrodite, and he can hardly fail to catch the measure. But give him such other ones as :

And with voices tuned to the Lord in music,
or :

Everlasting peace in Thy halls of splendour, and he will be puzzled. The first two syllables in each of these lines have no natural weight. We force them into the required form, but he will probably make them an anacrusis. To ensure the metre being read as intended, the first syllable of each line should be always strong, and by preference long; the second weak, and by preference short. Unless a writer does this he is not really "making metre," but is leaving his reader to make it. A glance at Swinburne's example will show that he seldom leaves any possibility of doubtful stress in the first foot, or, indeed, in any other.

A SUFFRAGETTE MUMMER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—You will in all probability not be greatly surprised to learn that Mr. Forbes Robertson, so far from profiting by the excellent advice which you some time ago tendered to him, is at present taking advantage of the opportunities afforded by a provincial tour, throughout which he is impersonating a doddering, boarding-house Christ, in a blasphemous and illiterate production entitled The Passing of the Third Floor Back, to deliver harangues at every stopping-place of the most approved Hyde Park description under the auspices of The Women's Social and Political Union.

Upon his tub-thumper fustian it would be mere waste of your valuable space to dilate. The solitary fact that he is figuring as a twin-star in the Suffragette firmament with Miss Adela Pankhurst—the poetic and romantic Christabel being doubtless engaged in inciting her compatriots to deeds of derring-do in the shape of ringing bells, flying kites, smashing windows, and scrawling upon pavements in some distant sphere dedicated to her peculiar talents—speaks eloquently for itself.

To reconcile the avocation of a mummer with that of a Suffragette stump-orator is an impossible task, and as a disciple of Mrs. Pankhurst—and obviously also in a secondary degree of Mr. Keir Hardie—it would, consequently, be Mr. Forbes Robertson's wisest course to desist from going "here and there" and "making himself a motley to the view," and frankly adopt the career of a hooligan's knight errant and Socialistic agitator.

"THE KING'S ENGLISH."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—When reading the lively correspondence on "The King's English" (Clarendon Press) which appeared in your columns a short time ago, I recalled to mind the pleasure and profit with which I first read Mr. Washington Moon's trenchant criticisms many years ago. Some of your readers will doubtless recollect Mr. Moon's books, the titles of which were "The Dean's English" (a criticism of Dean Alford's "Lectures on the Queen's English"), "Bad English Exposed," "The Revisers' English," and "Ecclesiastical English," all of which are now, unfortunately, out of print. The first two had a very large sale, and I do not think that any book of the same nature ever elicited so many favourable Press notices. If the Clarendon Press, or any other enterprising firm of publishers, were to acquire, and reprint, the two first-named books at popular prices they would do great service to young students desiring to gain a thorough knowledge of the resources of their mother tongue. Mr. Moon is not only an acute controversialist of admirable wit and temper, but is also a great master of clear and forcible English. The "Dean's English," particularly, is so full of wit and wisdom that it is, to me, a perennial source of pleasure, and seldom do I leave home for a holiday without finding a place for the little volume in my travelling-bag.

T. OWEN.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
sgd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

The Jew and Human Sacrifice

By HERMANN L. STRACK, D.D., Ph.D., Regius Professor of Theology at the University of Berlin. Royal 8vo, cloth gilt 10s. net. Post free from the Publishers, 10s. 6d.

The main intention of the Author is to dispose finally of the oft-repeated accusation of ritual murder made against the Jews in various countries. Although in England we hear little of such terrible accusations, there can be no doubt that in many countries in the East, as well as in some European countries—notably Germany and Russia—a belief still lingers that human beings are tortured and sacrificed, and that their blood is employed in ceremonial observances by Jews.

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"... He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible hitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chaloner believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thighed scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chaloner goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horseshoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern—

A fecund sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" 'at th' Opera,
Replete with costly bags and matrons fair!
His volantes doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx drest to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chaloner steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spang'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Healey might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chaloner to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

LIFE AND LETTERS

WE do not think it worth while to devote any space to a detailed examination of Mr. Lloyd George's Budget. It is exactly the sort of Budget which might have been conceived by a draper's assistant who had been for many years a victim of the "living-in system." In the case of the Licensing Bill and the last three successive Education Bills introduced by this Government of mischievous lunatics we recorded our conviction, as their details became known, that they had not the smallest chance of becoming law, and they have now all been definitely consigned to the rubbish heap. Mr. George's Budget will go to join them, and before many months are over Mr. George will be considering the advisability of once more devoting his energies and his massive intellect to the soliciting business of the firm of Messrs. Lloyd George, Roberts and Co., of which he has been for so long a distinguished ornament. By that time he will have qualified for the pension for which his soul pants, and his proposals to smash up the Constitution of the country, to ruin her trade and to pauperise her population, will be looked back on merely as a bad joke. Meanwhile, those who have money lying idle cannot do better than to invest it in land, in breweries, and in all the industrial and commercial securities which would be ruined if the little Welsh attorney's proposals had any serious chance of being carried into effect. All such securities have gone down in value owing to the failure of most people to realise that these wild-cat schemes constitute the last card played by a desperate and defeated party on the eve of dissolution, and foredoomed to complete annihilation at the polls. Consequently now is the time for anyone who has money to invest, and who does not believe that the whole country, including the House of Lords, has gone stark staring mad, to buy them for all he is worth. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's breakdown in the middle of his Budget speech, and his pathetic wails for milk to sustain his flagging efforts, suggests that the most pressing need of the moment is not Dreadnoughts for the Navy but pap-boats for His Majesty's Ministers.

It is nothing less than scandalous that the Unionist party should have been robbed of a great victory at Sheffield by the intrusion of Mr. Muir Wilson, the Independent Unionist candidate. By his action, Mr. Muir Wilson has demonstrated his ineligibility ever to be accepted at any future election as the official candidate of the Unionist party. He must have been perfectly aware that he stood no chance of being elected, and that the only effect of his candidature would be to jeopardise the chances of Mr. King-Farlow. In other words, he has sacrificed the party which he professes to support to his own private ends. The result has been that a Socialist, the aggregate of whose votes only represents one-fourth of the whole constituency, has scraped in by a narrow majority. It is hard to understand the blind folly of the two thousand eight hundred Unionists who voted for Mr. Muir Wilson, knowing as they must have done that they were deliberately playing into the hands of the enemy. Another thing which is hard to understand is the apathy in this matter of the leaders of the Unionist party. Why, we should like to know, did not Mr. Balfour write a strong letter to Mr. King-Farlow wishing him success and calling upon all loyal Unionists to support him? At the very lowest computation such a letter printed in all the newspapers must have diverted five hundred votes from Mr. Muir Wilson to the official candidate, which would have been more than sufficient to give him a handsome majority. We are glad to see that in the Stratford election, which has just resulted in a splendid and overwhelming victory for the Conservative candidate, Mr. Balfour intervened in a forcible manner, and completely undid the mischievous intrigues of certain Conservative papers, which were loudly advocating the claims of Captain Kincaid-Smith, the Independent Liberal candidate. The aforesaid journals, including the Standard, have been made to look very foolish indeed. For the last fortnight the special correspondent of the Standard at Stratford has been writing reams of nonsense about Captain Kincaid-Smith's "quiet confidence" as to the result of the election. Out of a constituency of about ten thousand, the quietly confident Captain Kincaid-Smith has succeeded in securing exactly four hundred and seventy-nine votes. The Standard must really try in future to distinguish between quiet confidence and brazen-faced bluff.

Commenting last week on the general question of Mr. Asquith's Bill for disestablishing and disendowing the Church in Wales we reserved the consideration of a particular point to which sufficient attention has not been drawn. The Bill contains a clause affecting the Church beyond the confines of the Principality and Monmouthshire. It provides for the suppression of four Spiritual Peerages open to the Episcopate in England. Peculiar peerages are attached to the Archbishops, the See of London, and one or two others in England; none are so attached to the Welsh Sees. The present occupants of the Welsh Sees hold peerages by virtue of seniority in the whole Episcopate. Their peerages are thus incidental as regards Wales, and personal as regards themselves, for they would retain them in the event of their translation to any English Sees. If also either of the Welsh Sees were to become vacant by death or resignation the peerage now held by its occupant would pass to the occupant of an English See. This clause alone gives Mr. Asquith's Bill an essential difference from the Act which disestablished the Church of Ireland. It is a clause which intimately affects a temporality of every See in England to which a peculiar peerage is not attached—namely, the right of succession to a seat in the House of Lords.

A bishop holding such a right in England, who conscientiously favours disestablishment, is thus placed in a position notoriously anomalous for an honourable man, for if he supports the Bill he will advocate the alienation of the very temporalities which he has sworn to defend. How an honourable clergyman can occupy so equivocal a position passes the comprehension of mere laymen, as long as easy relief from duties which he cannot conscientiously perform is open to him by resignation. But more than one clergyman has accepted episcopal preferment with the deliberate intention of betraying the trust which the acceptance of his office imposed upon him.

Prelates not occupying such Sees, and the minor orders of clergy in England, are in a totally different position. They can, if they please, advocate Welsh disestablishment consistently, if they believe that the alienation of temporalities would be preferable to the constant intermeddling of political Nonconformity in the internal affairs of the Church, both locally and by means of the State. But they would be wise if they weighed the question whether such intermeddling would cease with establishment and endowment. We doubt it, for there are many recusant or non-conforming religious bodies which rarely, if ever, so interfere, either personally or collectively, generally or locally; though they have precisely the same untenable ground for doing so. Roman Catholics, Methodists of many forms, the religious persons popularly called Swedenborgians, and Irvingites, Jews, Mahometans, agnostics and most atheists are content with their own liberty, and reasonably leave that of the Church of England alone. Political Nonconformists seek to curtail it on principle, because it is a protest against the domination towards which they wriggle. We shall be told that we "go too far" in these accusations; we hope so, for we have gone too far before and many of our contemporaries are now quite abreast of us.

Mr. Bottomley makes the following announcement with regard to certain litigation which was pending against him: "All suggestions of bad faith having been withdrawn, matters have been adjusted to the satisfaction of everyone concerned, and I am at length free to resume my public work, which was so rudely interrupted last November." Mr. Bottomley is evidently under the impression that fate cannot harm him, because he has dined. Let him be under no misapprehension. If the Treasury is content to allow the best legal opinion in the country to be over-ridden by the mere breath of a City alderman we, for our part, are not content. It is not seemly that a man like Bottomley should be allowed to publish and scatter broadcast a book in which he asserts that British justice is a foul and mud-bespattered affair, and that he has been prosecuted because of his political views, and that the alderman's judgment in the matter proves that the Treasury had no grounds other than political grounds for prosecuting him. This may be good enough for the Treasury, but it is not good enough for the country. So long as Bottomley's book is in circulation Bottomley libels not only the Government, which is of no great consequence, but English justice, which is still, and always will be, a great affair. No matter what the cost may be, Mr. Bottomley should be brought before some tribunal for these foul aspersions of his, aspersions for which he has already been fined three hundred pounds, and it should be made evident to the people of England that Justice is never afraid. We should advise Bottomley to take out of his book the cartoon which represents Justice covered with mud and with mud in her scales. And we advise him also to withdraw his cock-and-bull tales that he had been prosecuted because he voted against the Licensing Bill. And he must do this at once. Mr. Bottomley has professed in the House of Commons to be very anxious for the honour and good name of the British Minister at Belgrade. Questions addressed to the Foreign Secretary by a man who lately went out of his way grossly and brutally to insult Field-Marshal Earl Roberts are very pretty, even though they happen to have been inspired by Herbert Vivian, otherwise Jim Crow, who wrote the abominable article about Lord Roberts.

That wonderful "literary" organ, the Bookman, has just issued a number largely devoted to an account of the private affairs of Miss Marie Corelli. A good many more years ago than we care to remember we were able to point out in print that Miss Marie Corelli was a young woman of prepossessing appearance and devoted to the memory of Shakespeare. We saw her house at Stratford, and her gondola on the river, and managed to retain our mental balance. What is further, we saw Miss Corelli with a wreath at a Shakespeare celebration, and refrained from going into hysterics over it. So that the Bookman's pictures, which include photographs of all sorts of odd people, besides Miss Corelli, do not greatly distress us. Neither does the bulk of the Bookman's letterpress. But here is a passage by Dr. Nicoll's young man—none other than the minor poet, A. St. John Adcock—which requires to be challenged:

The superiority of your very superior literary person depends upon his being able to maintain that literature is not for all the world, but is a sort of exotic that can only be cultivated and appreciated in precious select holes and corners. In the interests of this gospel—for popularity is an offence to those who cannot obtain it—no living author has been more persistently maligned and sneered at and scouted by certain sections of the Press—by the presumptuous and struttingly academic section of it particularly—than has Miss Marie Corelli; and none has won (by sheer force of her own merits, for the Press has never helped her) a wider, more persistently increasing fame and affection among all classes of that intelligent public which reads and judges books, but does not write about them.

And our dear little poet goes on to point out that while the critics were condemning "A Romance of Two Worlds" Queen Victoria was sending Miss Corelli congratulatory telegrams about it, Mr. Gladstone was calling upon her also with congratulations, and the Empress of Austria's secretary telegraphed to say that Miss Corelli's books had "afforded Her Majesty many hours of happiness and rest." Now, it is clear that there have never been three finer judges of literature in the world than the late Queen Victoria, the late Mr. Gladstone, and the late Empress of Austria. It is clear that when such people read and admire a book it is a great book, and the author is a great author. We do not suppose that Mr. George Meredith has ever received congratulatory telegrams from the late Queen Victoria or that the late Mr. Gladstone called upon him, or that his books afforded many hours of happiness and rest to the late Empress of Austria. Argal: Mr. George Meredith is nowhere as a literary portent while Miss Corelli is about. When Mr. Adcock puts forward such sophistry for the consumption of the nid-noddies who read the Bookman he prostitutes any little gift that God may have given him. And he prostitutes that little gift knowingly and for the few miserable guineas of Dr. Robertson Nicoll.

A visit the other day to the Gaiety Theatre to see the performance of Our Miss Gibbs, which is now being played to crowded houses, forced us to the conclusion that there is a great deal more wit and cleverness in this delightful production than in any three of the modern "intellectual" sociological plays by our Shaws, Galsworthys, Granville Barkers, and the rest of them. The reason of this seems to us that whereas these last gifted authors—who, by the way, are Socialists, male suffragettes, and faddists to a man—endeavour to obtain their effects by a tremendous attempt at realism, the authors of such plays as Our Miss Gibbs obtain theirs by caricature. The elaborate realism of the first kind of play defeats its own ends, for it is a realism which is coloured by the fantastic and ill-balanced minds of its authors. Life as seen through the dull green spectacles of Mr. Shaw or Mr. Galsworthy and their like does not resemble real life as a whole, though each component part may be carefully studied from life itself. In any case, the result is apt to be boring, and the pleasure which one does sometimes obtain from it is invariably marred by the violent intrusion of the writer's own particular views and his determination to preach to the audience. A play like Our Miss Gibbs (and it is the best Gaiety piece we have seen for years) is a clever caricature of real life, and the result is that the people of the play, for all their absurd antics, are far more like real men and women than the puppets in the Shaw type of play, just as a good caricature of a man is nine times out of ten a better likeness than a photograph. Then, again, the acting at the Gaiety, taking it all round, is better than that of any other London theatre. It is hardly too much to say that every part is equally well acted, the actors and actresses are all stars, while the dancing is excellent, and the number of beautiful girls collected together is amazing. The only thing not quite up to the mark in the present case is the music, but that will probably be improved by the addition of new songs as the run of the piece goes on.

The Coliseum is to be congratulated upon a bill which, if it be not over-exalted in the artistic sense, is, at any rate, sufficient to fill the house twice daily. On Monday the management produced a new "sketch" entitled Slippery Bill. We went round to witness this particular item for reasons of our own. That is to say, Mr. Charles Goodheart was to appear in Slippery Bill. Mr. Goodheart duly appeared, and did all that was required of him. Our reflections on Mr. Goodheart's association with such a part will probably coincide with Mr. Goodheart's own reflections on the subject, and they lie too deep for tears. Slippery Bill itself, however, is a good deal better than the average music-hall sketch, and, needless to say, it is a good deal better acted. If Mr. Goodheart is to go to vaudeville, however, surely something ampler could be written for him. For the rest of the Coliseum programme, it is excellent in its way; though we are afraid that the unblushing imitations of Mr. Fragon offered by a Mr. Le Gros, are not altogether admired by the Coliseum audience.

If the tale of our daily contemporaries is anything like correct, ten thousand quasi-political prisoners in Constantinople is a fair allowance for a strictly constitutional Government to start with. It will be interesting to see how the Mussulmans of Albania and Asia Minor, with our own fellow-subjects in India and Egypt, like the imprisonment or death of a Commander of the Faithful of conspicuous ability and the substitution for him of one who is said to be amiable. We hope that our wise Government has provided against new and acuter problems in the Nearer East. When history can be written without fear of unpleasant national or party disclosures, and presumably not before, unless the knowledge is forced upon us, we shall learn whether the Press generally obeyed official hints in its apparently idiotic attacks on the perfectly legitimate action of Austria and Bulgaria last summer; and whether Sir Edward Grey's policy has had any other than its apparent result, the making of a new enemy in Austria and of ourselves a laughing-stock to the rest of Europe and, still worse, to Asia.

LE RÉCIF DE CORAIL

(De Hérédia.)

BENEATH the seas, the sun mysteriously
Leads on the dawn in coral forest ways
That mingle, in the abysses of their warm bays,
Live blossoms and sea-creatures flowery;
And stained with salt or iodine for dye
Mosses, rough algæ, sea-flowers, urchins trace
A chequer-work of purple on the face
Of wreathed madrepores and polypi.

With sheeny harness of enamelled scales,
A giant fish between the branches trails,
Indolently, in the translucent shade,
And from his sudden fin of fire, and through
The slumbering, crystalline, immobile blue,
Flushes a glory of pearl and gold and jade.

M. JOURDAIN.

THE MURDER OF JOHN DAVIDSON

WE have received considerable correspondence concerning an article called "The Muse of Commerce" which appeared in these columns last week. Several of our correspondents answer themselves by reason of their violent and unprintable language. One of them who is not abusive at all, and another who is angry to the point of criminal libel, we shall endeavour to answer. The non-abusive gentleman is greatly exercised because we have described Mr. William Watson as "something of a poet" and "a great deal of a journalist." And he adds: "It is a pity that those who are of the same household should fail to recognise each other." We are not of the same household as Mr. William Watson, and if Mr. William Watson fails to recognise us, so much the worse for Mr. William Watson. We have described him as something of a poet, and we see no reason for taking back these cruel words. We have described him also as a great deal of a journalist; and we see no reason to withdraw or to modify the description. Mr. Watson belongs to a different household from our own, inasmuch as he is a poet who has taken his gifts—which gifts we have never denied—into the political market. He belongs to the Liberal party, who once gave him a grant of money, and if he is not a pensioner, he has at any rate rendered the political services which usually help a man to Government money. For several years past Mr. Watson, the poet, has been as good as dumb. Mr. Watson, the journalist, on the other hand, has been fairly busy, and has bestowed upon us such mighty works in pure journalism as "The Purple East," "The Year of Shame," and an "Ode on the Coronation of King Edward the Seventh." There is no harm in these works to speak of, and, in a sense, they are good journalism; but they are nothing more than journalism, and it is on the strength of them, and on the strength of the absence of any recent work of poetry by Mr. Watson, that we have called him a great deal of a journalist. His late letter to the Times, which has brought his name once again before a public that might easily forget him, was a piece of journalism, pure and simple. It contained all sorts of childish charges against the public and against criticism, and if Mr. Watson's intellect told him that it was a letter which could serve a good purpose we can only say that his intellect is thus proved to be a journalistic intellect, and not the intellect of the poet. It is necessary for us to emphasise the fact that Mr. Watson himself has not complained to us, and that we have not the smallest reason for supposing that the complaint made by our correspondent would be approved by Mr. Watson. Our correspondent is very anxious that we should remember Mr. Watson's good works. We have never forgotten them, and we have no desire to discount them. We have always been willing to suppose that Mr. Watson's six years of silence as poet proper may mean that he has great work on hand or that great work is being meditated. We may be mistaken, and if we are mistaken we shall still reckon it to Mr. Watson's credit that, rather than give us bad work, he has remained dumb. And if he had remained dumb about politics we should have no ground to complain against him whatever; we might even have forgiven him his letter about Mr. Davidson, feeble and unbalanced as it is.

Now, as to our second correspondent. This person puts initials to his letter, which initials we shall refrain from printing. He does not disclose his name and he does not disclose an address. He appears to have taken elaborate precautions to prevent us from discovering who he might be. One precaution, however, he omitted to take; and, consequently, we are in a position to name him if we so desire. Meanwhile, we will take a few of the severer remarks contained in his letter, which he "dares" us to publish:

Now that you have murdered John Davidson I hope you are content. William Watson is wrong: his blood is not on the head of the English public: it is solely on the head of Lord Alfred Douglas. . . . John Davidson's death is as surely placed to your account as the death of any poor murdered wretch is placed to the account of any miserable assassin. "The pen is mightier than the sword!" Good God, yes! But it has been left to you to show that the pen can also be as foul and filthy as the bravo's stiletto. Print this in your fetid rag if you dare.

If we knew as little of our charming correspondent as he imagined we should know when he committed his bold and burning words surreptitiously to the post we should have refrained from printing his letter in spite of his elegant challenge; because, when all is said, vulgar abuse is vulgar abuse, and not a subject for discussion. But through his own negligence in his office as hole-and-corner spit-spitter our friend has put us into possession of certain facts. And we shall, therefore, take the trouble to inform him and his friends that whether the blood of Mr. John Davidson be or be not on our head we shall not hesitate at any time to condemn in these columns such works as the "Testament of John Davidson," which was the last work Mr. Davidson published before his death, and we shall not hesitate to describe them in the only fitting and honest terms in which they can be described—namely, as blasphemous works. Mr. Davidson is presumed to be dead. We are bidden by the wise to say nothing but good of the dead. We shall not speak anything evil of Mr. John Davidson; we know nothing of him personally, and we have never heard anything against his good name as a citizen or as an ordinary man. The fact that a poet leads a blameless life, that his accounts are in order, and that he enjoys the friendship and patronage of such gentlemen as Mr. Grant Richards and the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail is interesting in its way, but it has nothing to do with our sole concern, which happens to be criticism. Our article on Mr. Davidson's "Testament" and our subsequent remarks on his letter to us are extant and may be read by anybody who chooses to refer to them. They were severe articles, but there is not a line in them which we regret or which we should wish to soften or modify. If Mr. Davidson had come to us before those articles appeared in print and had said to us: "If you print those articles I shall commit suicide," we should have printed them without the smallest hesitation. His only way of escape would have been to withdraw his book from circulation. These will probably be set down to our credit for callous and brutal words. We shall not attempt to defend them, inasmuch as they require no defence. The publication of "The Testament of John Davidson" and the puffs which the book received at the hands of Mr. James Douglas and from such journals as the Nation and the Fortnightly Review constituted the most traitorous and scandalous attempt to betray and degrade the spirit of poetry that has been witnessed in modern times. We trounced Mr. Davidson for what he did while he was still amongst us. He replied to us to the best of his ability, and we printed his letters until they became unprintable and he betook himself for space to the Star newspaper. We told the Star newspaper the plain truth about the whole matter, and we told the Nation the plain truth. Mr. James Douglas had no answer; Mr. Massingham had no answer. Both of them knew that THE ACADEMY'S view was an absolutely just, proper and righteous view. Neither of them could as much as whisper a denial of it. Yet both of them had done all that in them lay to force this dangerous and impious work of Mr. Davidson down the throats of their unsuspecting readers, and both of them failed to admit their error or to do anything to correct it. And now that Mr. Davidson is dead, what do we find? The Spectator has written on the subject; the Nation has written upon it; we have had Mr. William Watson in the Times, and Mr. this, that and tother in pretty well every other journal that considers itself concerned with letters. And the only moral these marvellous periodicals, with Mr. Watson to help them, find themselves able to draw is, that the late Mr. Davidson was an indifferent poet, and that the difficult question of poets' pensions is a difficult question. We have let them have their say before we say our say. And we say that the moral of it all has nothing to do with either Mr. Davidson's abilities or Mr. Davidson's pension. It is a pure affair of Mr. Davidson's sanity. "The Testament of John Davidson" is the work of either a brute or a madman. Mr. Grant Richards had no business to publish it, and he has no business to continue publishing it. It is a work of pure negation and pure blasphemy, intended, if it have any intention at all, to insult God and to break the spirit and destroy the hope of God's creature, man. It is charitable to presume the author of such a work to have been insane. And for all people who write and for all people who wish to write, and for all people who esteem themselves journalists or critics, or the friends of genius, or the friends of letters, and for all publishers there is this further to be said: That when a man comes to you and says flatly, "I am the greatest of men and there is no God, and there is no Spirit, and there is nothing but matter," you must not shout, "Here is a prophet and a good man," but "Here is an unfortunate man who has lost himself and who is not responsible for what he says," and you must decline to publish what he writes, and you must decline to praise it no matter what beautiful opportunities it may offer you for emolument or advertisement. Any man who has the smallest regard for John Davidson, poet, and the smallest influence with John Davidson's representatives will use that influence for the suppression of "The Testament of John Davidson." And any man who has the smallest regard for his fellows will remember that the Star newspaper and the Nation and the Fortnightly Review have praised and helped to sell an impious book which is discreditable to English letters, to English poetry, and to English publishing.

SOME OLD-FASHIONED CHILDREN'S BOOKS

IN discussing affairs of fifty or sixty years ago and comparing them with those of the present time, the epithet "old-fashioned" must be used with caution and in a qualified manner. It may seem superfluous to emphasise so apparent a truism that the methods which to-day we call antiquated and out-of-date were once the most recent and approved lines of procedure, accepted by competent authorities and serving valuable purposes in their generation, but the obvious is often overlooked, and one of the most difficult mental processes to perform in any way adequately is that of transposing our point of view. We forget that competence is a matter of time and degree, discovery and education; the unprecedented swiftness of modern life is against us; the inordinate accumulation of impressions through the mediums of print, of quicker access from place to place, of telephone and telegraph, baffles us. To be retrospective with any measure of accuracy we have to sweep aside a prodigious array of things which have become integral parts of our daily existence in order that the vista of the past may be unobstructed, and only when this is done can we eliminate from the term "old-fashioned" the suggestion of contempt with which a great many of us are inclined to endow it. On the other hand, it must be allowed that in some instances a kind of humorous surprise, an indulgent censure, is unavoidable when we consider the moods and manners of our ancestors. Analogies drawn from fashion's vagaries are not very safe, since foibles of dress and design may recur at any hour; but never again, it is perfectly certain, will literature return to the style of the earlier years of the nineteenth century. And of children's books this statement is more than ever true.

Only in the last two or three decades, it seems, have we made any urgent attempt to give the mind of the child its fare in an appetising manner. It has been our fortune to chance upon an old packet containing "Literature for the Young," of varying dates, and to contrast it with the boys' and girls' books which come from the enterprising authors of the present day is edifying in the extreme—much more edifying than to read the "Literature" itself. Doubtless mothers have loved and children have played, fibbed, and wept from the beginning of things, but the dreary morality of these astonishing little volumes is calculated to raise a spirit of wonder as to how these mythical mothers, with their endless prosings, appealed to the real flesh-and-blood mothers, and how these very, very circumspect and sedate infants seemed to the children whose emulation they were supposed to inspire. Not that we would infer morality to be an undesirable quality in child or man, but—there was such a flood of it in these fearsome pages! The favourite methods of the writers could be grouped under three or four headings and leave hardly any exceptions. A good boy and girl were introduced, conspicuously well-behaved, veritable moral Maxim guns, primed to the muzzle with virtuous remarks; to them enters presently an exceedingly bad boy or girl, or both, for whom bird's-nesting and teasing the cat are the chief ends of existence. Then the bad boy's behaviour sets off the good boy into a perfect ecstasy of self-righteousness and reproof, and the bad boy, instead of exchanging a modicum of healthy head-punching, and thereby equalising the moral tension, as in the electrical laboratory the positive and negative balls are discharged by contact, professes to be vastly interested. His arguments are, of course, refuted one by one, and he ends by leading a better life, as advertised by selling his collection of birds' eggs and giving the proceeds to the gardener's golden-haired daughter, who is generally ill in bed and so priggishly patient that we want to box her ears. Occasionally, as a variation, the good boy makes unfortunate slips from the highway of rectitude, and then we have a stern (but very kind) father, or a gentle (but very firm) mother, who reasons with forensic gifts that would humiliate learned counsel. Let us hear the lustrous children in one or two of their speeches. George—it is a favourite name with these writers, and they somehow manage to give it a moral smack—has been hit by a cricket-ball; Walter and his sister visit a farmyard:

"You never told us of your accident before," said Agnes. "Were you much hurt?"

"It was very painful at the time," said George, "but soon got well. It was not worth while to make dear mamma uneasy for such a trifle."

"I hope," said Walter, "I shall never be greedy like these pigs. How they are pushing one another to try to get the best and most. I wish Master Harding could see them; I think it would cure him of gluttony."

"Hush, Walter," said Agnes, "we must not speak ill of the absent. Let us rather learn the hatefulness of gluttony, the pleasure of giving to others, and living together in love and peace."

Georgie (another one) has been discovered in tears because various untoward events have happened, and his father gracefully urges that everything should be told:

"Come, Georgie," he continued, smiling, after a moment's pause, seeing that his little boy still stood beside him without taking the seat he had pointed out, "if you really do not wish to give me this history of your troubles, tell me so, frankly and fairly, and do not seek for false excuses."

"Papa," said Georgie, in some confusion, "the reason why I do not wish to tell you about my misfortunes is, that I am afraid you may not think them great enough to excuse me."

"But, my dear boy, do you think this is honest?"

"I will not deceive you, papa; I will be quite honest, and tell you everything," said Georgie, frankly, sitting down besides him.

He thereupon confesses that the sun was so bright when it "came peeping in" at his window that morning that he rose early, thinking to play with his pet rabbits; that when he went to find Lizzie, his sister, "she was not nearly ready to go to mamma's room to read our chapter," and so he had to wait. That upset his temper, and he cried because he could not reach a basket that was hanging on a hook, and wept again because the said basket tipped up and spilled some cabbages. The conversation upon this exhilarating topic occupies eleven pages of close print, after which poor Georgie is sent in to his lessons.

Little Henry, however, is the most luridly good of this bunch of good boys. He lived in India, and "was taught by the servants many things which a little boy should not know; but the servants, being heathens, could not be expected to teach him anything better; and therefore they were not so much to be blamed as the lady who had undertaken the charge of Henry, who might have been ashamed to leave the child under the care of such persons." She, it seems, was "one of those fine ladies who will give their money (when they have any to spare) for the relief of distress, but have no idea how it is possible for anyone to bestow all his goods to feed the poor, and yet want charity." Fortunately the daughter of a clergyman "came to reside for a while with his mamma," and, although he was then but five years of age and could speak only Hindoo, acquired from constant companionship with his bearer, "so diligent was she, that before he was six years old he could spell any words, however difficult, and could speak English quite readily." She told him of a great many things in which a child of tender years might be expected to take an interest, including "the dreadful hell, prepared for those who die in their sins." Under her tuition Henry becomes a paragon, and a very irritating one. "He never said a bad word, and was vexed when he heard any other person do it. If anybody had given him a rupee he would not spend it in sweetmeats or playthings; but he would change it and give it to the fakirs who were blind or lame, or such as seemed to be in real distress, as far as it would go." And the conversations of this wonderful child proceed on these lines:

LADY: "Can you find me one person who deserves to be called good?"

HENRY: "Oh! I know that I am not good. I have done many, many naughty things, which nobody knows of."

LADY: "Then you think yourself a sinner?"

HENRY: "A very great one."

LADY: "Where do sinners go when they die?"

"Now," proceeds the author, "the lady was pleased with little Henry's answers; but she did not praise him, lest he should become proud."

Shortly after this, she goes away to be married to "a very pious young man of the name of Baron," and Henry, playing the game properly, begins to have premonitions of his approaching end:

"There is a country," said Henry, "where we shall all be like dear brothers. It is a better country than this: there are no evil beasts; there is no more hunger, no more thirst; there the waters are sure; there the sun does not scorch by day, nor the moon smite by night. It is a country to which I sometimes think and hope I shall go very soon. . . . Sometimes I think," said he, "when I feel the pain which I did this morning, that I shall not live long."

The reader is not disappointed; Henry dies beautifully; but the author concludes rather unkindly: "Little children in India, remember Henry, and go, and do likewise."

The bad boy usually is lectured by the good girl. Master Jenkins, of Mrs. Trimmer's "Fabulous Histories," was a very reprehensible character indeed, who stoned dogs, worried cats, and ought to have been soundly thrashed instead of being merely remonstrated with in this way:

"For shame, Master Jenkins!" said Miss Harriet. "How can you talk in that rhodomontade manner? I cannot believe any young gentleman could bring his heart to such barbarities."

"Barbarities, indeed! Why, have we not a right to do as we please to dogs and cats, or do you think they feel as we do? Fiddle-faddle of your nonsense, say I. Come, you must hear the end of my story."

"Stop! stop!" exclaimed Miss Harriet, "for pity's sake, stop! I can hear no more of your horrid stories, nor would I commit even one of those barbarities which you boast of for the world! Poor innocent creatures! What had they done to deserve such usage?"

"I beg, Edward," said his sister, "that you will find some other way to entertain us, or I shall really tell Mrs. Benson of you."

The bad boy proceeds in his gory narrative, but "Miss Benson and his sister stopped their ears."

The grown-up people of the "Nature" tales are no less alarming than those of the "moral" books. The children put leading questions at appropriate moments, and it is as though the cork had been taken out of a bottle. "Can you tell me, dear mamma, how many eggs the lark lays?" asks Agnes; and off they go:

"She lays," answered Mrs. Melville, "four or five. They are of a dusky colour, and she sits a fortnight before they are hatched. During this time her mate is most attentive, and cheers her with his song. Rising to an imperceptible height, he keeps his beloved partner in view, nor once loses sight of his nest, either in ascending or descending."

"Now, dear mamma," said Agnes, "we are all ready. Will you be so kind as to tell us the history of the grasshopper?"

"With pleasure," replied Mrs. Melville. "The insect Walter has found is one of the largest kind that is a native of this country."

This naturally leads on to the locust, which is the signal for several pages of dissertation and quotation. Mrs. Melville is aided and abetted by a Miss St. Clair, who is just as indefatigable and just as florid in her disquisitions. The children notice a dragon-fly, and this estimable lady responds as at the pressure of a spring:

"They are beautiful creatures," remarked Miss St. Clair. "I like to see them as they dart about in the sunshine, sparkling like gems, their polished wings reflecting the bright beams in which they revel; and darting after their prey with such rapidity, that the eye is unable to follow the mazy intricacy of their flight."

"Every insect is beautiful," said Mrs. Melville. "The garden, field, hedge, rivulet, are all animated with a profusion of beautiful creatures, sporting about, and lightly traversing the air in a thousand directions."

On their return from a ramble one evening, the party "contemplated, with great admiration, the sun just sinking behind the blue mountains in the distance, and irradiating them with a flood of golden light":

"This is the sunset I most admire," said Miss St. Clair. "So peaceful and tranquil, so bright and cloudless. The orb of day descending to the horizon like a large globe of fire, and leaving a beautiful crimson glow on the landscape, a promise of as brilliant a rising on the coming morn."

"I must say I do not agree with you," said Mrs. Melville. "This is a beautiful sunset, but I prefer a stormy one. There is more variety; the clouds are piled on another in massive grandeur, some of them like mountains of snow, almost dazzling the eye with their brilliant whiteness; others dark, concealed by intervening masses from the cheering brightness of the sun's rays, and frowning in majestic grandeur, like the beetling crag of some stupendous rock. Again, some reflect the rays of the sun, as he descends, in rich colouring, casting on the hills a purple tint, and adding to the beauty of the prospect. Then the glorious lunary is sometimes obscured by a cloud ere he reaches the horizon; but, emerging from his temporary veil, he appears more brilliant from the contrast of the dark shade that for a time surrounded him, and illuminating the landscape with a gorgeous crimson beam, his last gift, he sinks from our view, to cheer other climes with his life-giving influences."

As Mrs. Melville concluded the sun disappeared.

We can hardly blame it. Mrs. Melville is a perfect encyclopædia, and would effectually overwhelm the spirits of the liveliest picnic-party that ever set forth. She is for ever spotting some insect or animal and gushing about it. "On the upper branch of that thorn-tree is a little bird I want you to observe"—this is the sort of remark which comes most naturally to her lips.

The author of the "Fabulous Histories" previously quoted is not content with giving her human characters an impressive conversational equipment; she brings in a brood of robins whose remarks are simply staggering. Young Robin, the "bad boy" of the brood, has been showing off, and the parent retaliates:

"To show you that you are not master of the nest, I desire you to get from under my wing, and sit on the outside, while I cherish those that are dutiful and good." Robin, greatly mortified, retired from his mother; on which, Dicky, with the utmost kindness, began to intercede for him.

"Pardon, Robin, my dear mother, I entreat you," said he. "I heartily forgive his treatment of me, and would not have complained to you, had it not been necessary for my own justification."

A mocking-bird is a secondary character here, and the reader might feel inclined to rebel were it not for the sublime footnote—"The mock-bird is properly a native of America, but is introduced here for the sake of the moral"! In a flight en famille, the robins witness the shooting of a redstart and have a severe lesson, which is "rubbed in" by the ineffable parent in a manner which makes the reader long to wring his neck:

He (the redstart) struggled just long enough to cry, "Oh, my dear father! Why did I not listen to your admonitions, which I now find, too late, were the dictates of tenderness?" and then expired.

"He was shot to death," says the elder robin, "and had you not followed my directions, it might have been the fate of every one of you. Therefore, let it be a lesson to you to follow every injunction of your parents with the same readiness for the future. . . ."

The adults in this book talk, of course, in the same grandiose style:

After her little visitors had departed, Miss Harriet went into the drawing-room, and having paid her compliments, she sat herself down that she might improve her mind by the conversation of the company.

"I have been," said a lady who was present, "for a long time accustomed to consider animals as mere machines. . . but the sight of the Learned Pig, which has been lately shown in London, has deranged these ideas, and I know not what to think."

And the Pig is discussed minutely. At the finish, Master Jenkins, after a career of teasing animals, pulling his schoolmates' hair and pinching their arms, "was despised by all with whom he had any intercourse," and finally was thrown from "a fine horse," which he was "beating and spurring merely because it did not go a faster pace than it was able to do," to be killed on the spot as an awful warning; the rest of the company are fitted out with gifts suitable to their behaviour, and the book closes with genial wishes for her "young readers" on the part of the author.

Such was the children's fare of fifty and sixty years ago. Stories of adventure, of school doings, of life at all resembling the real thing, such as those which flood our bookshops at Christmas, were few and far to seek—almost, in fact, unknown. Ballantyne, Jules Verne, Kingston, Talbot Baines Reed—these names, and others dear to the hearts of boys of the seventies and eighties, were yet to come, and of periodicals devoted to juvenile pursuits and hobbies there was hardly one. Yet, certain as we might feel that a course of reading taken from literature of a type such as that quoted above would engender a race of little prigs of both sexes, it seems to have done more good than harm; there was nothing pernicious about it; it was distinctly—a trifle too distinctly—on the side of the angels. Our fathers used to read it—they had to read it, many of them!—and grew up fine specimens of the Englishman; our mothers pored over it, and lost no charm of sweet and adorable motherhood. The truth is that the human soul, regardless of politics or methods or movements, is essentially liberal, inherently mobile to changes of thought, modifications of manners, alterations of the point of view; in contact with the ever-fresh child-mind, although it may no longer "think as a child, speak as a child," and may have "put away childish things," it expands and adapts itself to the conditions which are new, harmonises with the schemes of a life that seems untraceable to its former heritage. The child's soul is the guardian of the world's faith. True child-likeness—which is very far from being childishness—often preserves a man from hurt and soil in the battle when a cynical acuteness would fail.

It is hardly likely that posterity will feel inclined to scoff at the literature which we now provide in such immense quantities for the children. Taken en masse, it is fairly innocuous, and far more calculated to inspire nobleness of character than the insipid and stilted brochures of former years, with their caricatures of good and bad children, their didactic fathers and mothers, who might have been wooden models for all the sense of naturalness they conveyed. When, in due course, our own time and century shall have become "old-fashioned," and the children romping in the nurseries to-day shall turn to a tattered pile of high adventures and daring deeds in bindings that once were brilliant, it is more than probable that they will be able to pass them down to the next generation with feelings of pleasure. And, however instructive and harmless Mrs. Trimmer and her contemporaries were, we cannot venture to do that with their books—we should be greeted with howls of derision from the nursery floor, and sent about our business, which would be to bring in something that should pass the young censors as up to standard in excitement and heroism. The old writers were far too fervently anxious about their young friends' rectitude, forgetting that children are never inherently base; forgetting, too, that while a horse may enjoy a feed of hay and be grateful for it, he might resent having a truss of it dropped upon his head!

BURLINGTON HOUSE

SECOND NOTICE.

THE justice of art criticism depends so much on the condition of the atmosphere, especially in the case of large galleries crowded with pictures, like Burlington House, that it is fortunate if later visits do not considerably modify the critic's judgement, since it is generally expressed the first time after a necessarily hasty examination. In the present case the first notice here has to be supplemented, but fortunately very little corrected. As before stated, it was confined to the works which chance rendered most conspicuous, and it may now be added that no consideration was given to names. Comparison scarcely comes within the purpose of these remarks, either between the well and little known artists, or between the earlier and later works of those long before the public eyes. Such comparison is unpleasant to make and but of little use where further development is not to be expected. Consequently some well-known names do not appear here at all. Their omission may be taken to indicate that the particular works representing them this year do not call for special comment of praise or blame.

Returning for a short time to portraits, Mr. Longstaff's portrait of Mrs. Davenport, though not particularly pleasing and a little oily in texture, deserves notice for its clever pose, its vivacity, and the correct balance preserved between the face and its surroundings. Mr. Tuke's little portrait of Miss Ida Hamilton has similar merits and is charming in colour. It is one of the rarer, or at any rate, less expected subjects of a painter from whom we have become accustomed to look for pastoral nudes. These are surely growing too jaundiced; and the effect of light cast by sunlit waters on the two youths in "Companions" is not very agreeable, even if it be true. Mr. Henderson's "Us" is obviously too intime to be anything but portraiture. It recalls so clearly the charming work of Kate Greenaway in water colours that it must be called "pretty," rather to its detriment. It portrays nice, lively children, simply dressed in becoming colours, but it illustrates, rather than chronicles them as portraiture should. The excellent little likeness of Sir Charles Holroyd by Lady Holroyd, not an experienced artist, must be noticed for its truth, and the amazing reality which we are happily still justified in expecting from a veteran, Sir W. Q. Orchardson, is to be found again in the face of "Mrs. Moss-Cockle." This reality is, of course, pre-eminent and cannot fail to strike the spectator immediately. It should have been recorded before, but it so amazed the critic, a tyro draughted to this particular field of observation, that it fell out of the first notice through nervous haste. There are two portraits in the "grand" style, attempts rather than complete achievements, but interesting because they show decided character in the artists: Mr. P. A. Hay's "La Marchesa," not a very pleasant portrait nor very agreeable in colour, but very clever and very successful in the pose and vivid personality of the figure; and Mr. G. F. Bird's anonymous "Portrait," a child in long drapery, rather pleasantly awkward, with an expression of precocious finesse. Another portrait by Mr. Nowell must be named as one of the most charming and widely attractive portraits of women, "Lady Bates and her youngest son, Maurice." Mr. Isaac Cohen calls "Fantasy" a portrait pleasing in colour of a woman half reclining in a pale pink-amethyst gown, with the light partly broken by a blind of thin laths. Finally as regards portraiture, Mr. Byam Shaw's group of figures resisting the force of wind is very cleverly drawn and less dangerous in colour than that artist's work often is. It suggests a fresh manner of treating a family group in portraiture; though the picture is not that actually, but a genre composition. It has a curious affinity in certain respects to early work by Mr. W. P. Frith.

As regards landscapes, justice must be done to Mr. East by a repentir. His landscape, "Amberley Bridge," looks so different in different lights that it is scarcely so good an example of his work permanently—as was implied here before—as another of his pictures, "Lavingdon Water." Among other treatments of snow Mr. E. H. Compton's "Winter in the Bavarian Highlands," with virgin snowdrifts in the foreground; Mr. E. T. Compton's "An Alpine Fastness," in which the snow is solid and realistic; Mr. Harry Adam's "The Valley Road," in which the snow is bathed in sunshine; and Mr. B. E. Leader's "In the Rhine Valley," though a little flat, all deserve notice. In the last artist's "A Moonlit Common," the low tone plays the part of the moon rather ineffectually. For the effects of snow and night Mr. Spenlove-Spenlove's treatment in "With-out" must be commended, so far as its position near the roof admits of trustworthy criticism. Mr. Rimington's "Procession of Boats," on the Dalmatian Lagoons, suggests dusk rather than night. The height at which many of these pictures are hung prevents more definite judgment of several of the landscapes here recorded, and to a certain extent of Mr. Fulwood's successful attempt to extract beauty out of the Medway Valley. He has produced a picture in agreeable cold tones, with considerable decorative qualities. It is one of a fairly numerous class seemingly painted with the view to their hanging in particular rooms, though they are not, strictly speaking, decoration. Others of this sort are Mr. Gardener Symons's "Angarrick," without much aerial perspective, but with a distinct light of early spring about it; and Mr. Dacres Adams's "Park Gates," with figures, which is decorative in design and not unpleasant, though rather bizarre in tone. Mr. Julius Olsson's second sea picture, "The Whitby Lights," has a gorgeous dark sky and effects of colour of the Turner type. Mr. David Smith's, "An Essex Farm," is English and green, with well expressed birch trees, and a rather too minutely treated foreground. Among large, somewhat academic, landscapes is Mr. Hughes-Stanton's, "St. Jean, near Avignon," difficultly green with the heavy green of summer, with blue mists rising among distant hills, not very characteristically but carefully painted, well composed, and decidedly a handsome canvas. Mr. Priestman's, "The Valley of the Wharfe," is of the same type, not so romantic, but more broadly treated, solid and accomplished. One or two canvases which need not be specified, pitched in sombre tones, still suggest the warning that to produce such tones the paint should not be mixed with mould. Even the blacks of Velasquez, for instance, have the black brilliance of the fur of a cat. Happily, there is a distinct improvement in this respect, for it is an error into which quite distinguished modern painters of all kinds have fallen and lain for some long periods together. Mr. Riddell's landscape, "The Footbridge," generally very pleasing, painted in well balanced light tones, is rather subtly affected by this fault.

Among figure pictures, Mr. George Clausen's "The Interior of an Old Barn" must be praised, not because it is his Diploma work, but because it merits praise as a characteristic specimen of his style, and on account of his true treatment of cross lights. Similarly Miss Lomax, in "Tea Time" attempts the double light of a fire and a lamp not without success, though she has not much skill in the treatment of texture. Mr. Arthur Hacker, in "The Gloaming," is misty and sentimental after the manner of Millet, an accomplished piece of painting after his own manner, and so realistic in "The Cowshed" that its greenish-yellow light suggests meadows and the scent of cows. It is a pity that Mr. C. Cowper's solid and careful painting in "Venetian Ladies Listening to the Serenade" has not produced the effect which it deserves. His failure to deal with the brilliancy of a Venetian night by means of nearly pure ultramarine is partly but not entirely responsible. In spite of their paint solidity his attractive ladies do not sufficiently suggest their third dimensions. Mr. Hornell's usual group of charming children in graceful movement shows his other characteristic also, his whites, brownish-purples and pinks, with that quality of paint which suggests white plaster flecked with water-colour. Miss Anna Airy's large picture, "Gossips," somewhat German in character, is generally well drawn and not unpleasing in colour, but it cannot be called an object of beauty. Beauty, however, is not held of much account in the school of painting to which she does much credit. She has quite sufficient strength to shed such limitations, indeed, it would not be easy to name a woman artist possessed of so much virile talent. No species of mammals vary much more in bulk than old women, so that it would be dangerous, though probably not far from the truth, to affirm that one or other of the old women at the extreme ends of her group are out of scale. The admission of Mr. Denis Eden's "Green Love" into Burlington House at all, is of itself sufficient to show that the Academy is yielding to the well-known influence of certain of its members and is enlarging its borders. "Green Love" is delightfully interesting, fantastic and original, suggestive to those who know it of the work of Richard Dadd, which Mr. Denis Eden has probably never seen. At any rate he is to be congratulated on having struck a note quite new to Burlington House. Except in one detail of his stalwart enchantress his drawing is fine and correct, and his colour, though limited, well contrasted, and he produces a very decorative effect with his well composed design in red, white and green. As to his technique, he has one of his own, by which he contrives to give oil the clearness of tempera.

To critics who regard sculpture as the art least capable in modern hands of expressing modern life, and therefore approach it in its present form with an attitude of mind quite different from that in which they approach it from its beginning until after the debasement of the Italian Renaissance work, Mr. Tweed's portrait-bust of Lady Londonderry in marble will be welcome as a successful example of its modern power. Mr. Tweed has not before equalled the correct modelling and vigorous vitality of this bust. Independent of any resemblance to the subject, which the spectator may not be in a position to judge, the bust of itself creates an imperial impression which is very unusual in modern busts. At the opposite pole, but very attractive for its beauty, is the marble head of the ephēbe, recalling a sweet-tempered Antinous, which Mr. A. J. Leslie has disguised as "The Muse of Theocritus," skilfully covering the hair with a finely woven winged cap so slightly indicated as not to hide the comely shape of the head. Mr. Benjamin Lloyd has succeeded in producing a graceful, if somewhat rococo, hermes, which he calls "The Vintage," a well-modelled half-length female nude, ending as usual in a well-proportioned rectangular pillar. Mr. Harvard Thomas's marble statuette, "Therpsis," close at hand, represents him in an unaccustomed phase not so suitable to him as his more Greek moods, but having decided realistic value. A bronzed plaster by Mr. Francis Jahn, "Diliana," is pleasing and dignified in a severe semi-modern and semi-renaissance manner. Miss Pease's portrait-bust in marble of Miss Janie Stockwell has a somewhat similar graceful dignity of a purely modern kind. Similar again in feeling, quite modern but more ideal, is the girl, Mr. McGill's statuette, "Peace," tall and straight like a realistic caryatid. Though Miss Ada Gell's title, "Kit with the Can-Stick," conveys nothing à propos to the skinny urchin whom she has modelled with grace and vivacity, he has a weird and somewhat sabbatic attraction, which his petasus and classic lanthorn scarcely suggest, unless he be taken for the impish Hermes of the Homeric hymn. Mr. Alfred Drury's "Panel over Entrance: Royal Insurance Office," attracts attention by its vigorous modelling, in spite of the uninteresting character of its object. Mr. Albert Toft's "Model for a part of the Welsh National War Memorial" is naturally much more interesting. The well posed seated figure clad in broadly treated drapery has a dignity and restrained pathos too uncommon in our public monuments. The face is beautiful and expressive, and the outstretched arms, and the hands particularly, are well modelled. Mr. Goscombe John extracts far more decorative effect out of the uncompromising vesture of a bishop, "The Late Bishop Lewis," than could be expected, in his effective, moderately rococo statue, which is to be erected in bronze in Llandaff Cathedral. Mr. Goscombe John and Sir George Frampton have difficulties imposed on them by modern life, beyond the powers of Phidias and Praxiteles—the late bishop's outstanding side-whiskers, and the posthumous quilted Astrachan-collared coat of Sir George Williams. Mr. Colton's bronze, a tiger, can better be described with the Germans as "pyramidal" than colossal; it is so excessively fierce that it does not seem in earnest. If it is correctly stated that the trustees of the Chantrey Bequest have purchased Mr. Derwent Wood's "Atalanta," his strange taste for semicircular protuberances all over the female form is likely to stimulate criticism of that already freely criticised trust. The number of sculptures has also been decreased this year, to the great advantage of those exhibited, and to the enjoyment of the visitors.

REVIEWS

THE AMOROUS DIARIST

Samuel Pepys. By PERCY LUBBOCK. (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.)

THE author of the imperishable Diary, which has proved to be no less valuable as a detailed impression of a human soul than as a circumstantial account of the period when it was in process of being compiled, is a fascinating subject for the biographer's art. Rarely is it given to the world to know thoroughly the private life of a man who occupies an exalted position in national and administrative affairs, but Samuel Pepys, with his astounding enthusiasm for trivialities, his remarkable frankness even when dealing with his own frequent and flagrant departures from virtue, and his cool acceptance of every good thing as a token that he had won the approval of a benignant Providence, presented posterity with a record which for interest and significance is hardly likely ever to be paralleled. We cannot agree with Mr. Lubbock, who has taken his task in hand so ably, when he announces his conclusion that Pepys was a type of the "ordinary man." Many hundreds of his exploits were doubtless very ordinary indeed; for ten years he revelled in setting down in black and white every little trifle of his daily life; his wife's irritating untidiness, the nature of the dinner-joint, the way he hums tunes, and the pleasure derived therefrom, a stomach-ache, a nosegay gathered in the fields—all goes in, mixed indiscriminately with State business, kings and scullions, with a preciosity positively amazing; but in the accepted usage of the term he himself was distinctly no ordinary man. He was extraordinary enough to push his way to the secretaryship to the Admiralty and the representation of a borough in Parliament, and for a hundred years after his death his memory was green in the Navy Department by reason of his talents alone, before ever the great diary came to light; extraordinary, too, it seems to us, in his peccadilloes and his apologetic way of referring to the code of rules which he drew up so carefully and so naively set aside when needful. We do not see how any thoughtful reader of the diary can come to any other decision.

Apart from this one dissension, we must congratulate Mr. Lubbock upon a neat, concise, and well-balanced study of his subject. His opportunity as Pepys Librarian at Magdalen College has been used most judiciously, and all those who are unfamiliar with the somewhat formidable tomes of the prolix original can gather what they require, or we should perhaps say sufficient to whet their appetite for more, from these pages. We know little of the early years of Pepys; "he would have been pained," says the author, "if he had foreseen that the only record of his life there which the college was to preserve, beyond formal notices of his admission and election as a scholar, was the famous entry in the College Register, dated October 21, 1653, in Morland's handwriting":

"Pepys and Hind were solemnly admonished by myself and Mr. Hill for having been scandalously overserved with drink ye night before. This was done in the presence of all the Fellows then resident in Mr. Hill's chamber."

The only other indication of his tastes and occupations at Magdalen is found in an entry in the Diary (January 30, 1664):

"This evening, being in a humour of making all things even and clear in the world, I tore some old papers; among others, a romance which (under the title of Love a Cheate) I begun ten years ago at Cambridge; and at this time, reading it over to-night, I liked it very well, and wondered a little at myself at my vein at that time when I wrote it, doubting that I cannot do so well now if I would try."

Pepys' actual design in making these voluminous notes during such a long period seems to be obscure:

His lust for reproducing his whole days seems to have been purely artistic. Just as the artist burns to reproduce the moment which strikes him as significant, and when he has done so gives it no further thought, so it was with Pepys, only that with him all moments were significant, and not one could be spared. . . . The Restoration of the House of Stuart, and the loss of the lobsters for dinner, were equally part of his treasured experience, and equally demanded permanent record. . . . Probably, he felt dimly that an accurate diary would be somehow useful. Still more probably, he would merely have said that he kept it because "it do please me mightily," and in that case he would have shown himself to be more of an artist than ever.

His intense superficiality prevented him from observing that the pictures of his days lacked all perspective. "There is something great," comments Mr. Lubbock, "about this whole-hearted absorption in one thing at a time." On the same page Pepys tells how he went to church one Sunday afternoon in order to see a pretty woman whom he heard would be there, and how annoyed he was when he got there to find an odious dancing-master leering at his wife from the gallery—"all without it even so much as occurring to him that there was any parallel between the two parts of his description: "

His Diary is like a mediæval miniature in the way in which every detail, significant or of no importance whatever, is rendered with equal tone and distinctness. Thus, while we read it critically—constantly, that is, placing it in relation to the larger problems and strifes of the time—it is important to remember that Pepys himself did nothing of the kind. The foreground was all in all to him, relative values were nothing. . . . A pretty woman or an eloquent preacher, an ingenious method of measuring timber, or a chance talk with a one-eyed Frenchman, a new periwig, or a new book, a nightingale, or a Jew's trumpet, it was all one to Pepys.

His devotion to women was as little chivalrous as could be. Of the many he pursued not one was an occasion of any romance whatever. His amorous adventures had no accompaniment of poetry, and he does not attempt to create one for them in his Diary, though the romping and giggling which they entailed are dwelt upon with loving particularity.

His candid way of describing these flirtations is one of the most amusing things in the Diary, as every student of it knows; and his innocent, easily-deciphered cryptogram, used on some rather shocking occasions, makes the acute reader of this advanced century wonder how he hoped to conceal anything by it—"sjø drikd kqifsgs hwepr bhemhridnxd thse dcovofr," for instance, the one example which Mr. Lubbock includes, does not need much brain-racking to give "so did kiss her behind the door"; and the medley of French and other languages which Pepys constructed for the same purpose is even more obvious. In many ways Pepys was just a jolly, overgrown child.

And at the time all this nonsense was being perpetrated the writer was earning the honour of being called by the Duke of Albemarle "the right hand of the Navy"! Nonsense, we say, for such a great deal of it is; but the nonsense has become so precious by lapse of time that it is sublimated into the finest possible presentation we could have wished for of the life of a man-about-town at that period; a presentation of historic importance, covering a crucial part of national events—the Plague, the Great Fire, and the war with the Dutch. No student of that time can afford to neglect Pepys' material, whatever else he misses, and the thought is bound to come that possibly some person of note at the present day is laying up for future generations treasure of the same description—the record of his amorous moments, his marital quarrels, his quiet hours with books, his walks and talks with his friends. It is possible, but not probable; the pace is too fast nowadays for a man to spend precious hours in confiding such things to a diary. If he did so, he would take it immediately to a publisher, and the first instalment would soon be on the market under the title of "Life's Under-currents," or, perhaps, "Still Waters Run Deep."

Mr. Lubbock has successfully traced the career of Pepys after his meticulous records had been abandoned, and arranged the facts in a way which leaves us no option but to praise his judgment and his clarity. In fact, to adopt the recurrent formula of the immortal diarist himself, we have read his book from cover to cover, and it "did please us mightily."

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS

The Tales of John Oliver Hobbes. (Unwin, 3s. 6d.)

THE opinion which the unthinking portion of the community holds about any author is a matter of very little importance, considered apart from questions of popularity and finance; the scales of ultimate criticism are neither raised nor depressed by it, and those of contemporary judgment merely vibrate to and fro vaguely in response to the clamour or the negligence of the crowd. The verdict of the minority, however, is not to be ignored in matters of literature, whatever may be the case in commerce or in those affairs of life which depend on figures and their combinations rather than on fancies and their interpretations; it is never worthless, often final—that is, lasting—and always responsible. By it the artist lives or starves; by that of the majority the time-server takes to himself an earthly mansion or drops out of the race. Between these two extremes the work of Mrs. Craigie occupies a position which is not always neatly or justly defended. Mrs. Craigie wrote well, and pleased the critics; she wrote epigrammatically, and a goodly proportion of the reading public became enamoured of her pages. Her style was by no means immaculate; the split infinitive is set down precisely as it occurs to her; her characters, in some instances, converse too elaborately for an effect of ease or facility. But she carries the reader with her, be he pedant or dilettante, by sheer brilliance. It is a brilliance without warmth, the glitter of swift sword-play rather than the glow from sunlit heights, the glint of steel polished and cold, not the dazzle of white-hot metal; but it fascinates, allures, and wins an admiration that is neither meagre nor unstable. Her plots proceed on the lines indicated by the motto with which she prefaces "The Sinner's Comedy": "In Life there are no Unities, but three Incomprehensibles: Destiny, Man and Woman." This is almost equivalent to saying that she followed the lead of all writers of the fiction that treats of human relationships; nevertheless, she had her own original methods of adorning the way. She abhorred, as a general rule, the lengthy, involved, decorative sentence; her phrases were brief and definite, her comments consisted frequently of detached, didactic statements which stimulate the reader into an amusement that is sometimes a trifle grim. In nine cases out of ten the idea of a heartache and an intense longing is suggested, prisoned behind the written words, for irony, sarcasm, and satire are the three weapons, deftly handled, by the flashes of which the stories are illumined. They appear in the author's asides:

Men heap together the mistakes of their lives and create a monster which they call Destiny. Some take a mournful joy in contemplating the ugliness of the idol. These are called Stoics. Others build it a temple like Solomon's, and worship the temple. These are called Epicureans. The Dean of Tenchester was a Stoic.

In the simple telling of the tale they often seem inseparable from Mrs. Craigie's chosen attitude:

Grace had no doubt married for what she considered affection. It was not very deep nor very strong, but it was essentially respectful. Perhaps, too, it was more than half gratitude. Provenance was the first man who had ever taken any marked interest in her as an individual; one or two had allowed her to play piano to their fiddle; here and there one had sent her a book "with the author's compliments"; dancing men, who dined at her mother's, usually asked her for a waltz and the lancers—somewhere at the end of a programme; men who didn't dance talked to her on politics, the theatres, religion, and other grave matters, but not one of them had ever, like Godfrey, talked to her about herself. Until she met him, she had bowed in humiliation and self-pity to her mother's dictum—"Grace was cut out to be a companion to an elderly lady, in exchange for a comfortable home—the sort of thing one reads in the Morning Post. She will never make a good marriage." He had given wings to a clay bird: as much gratitude as one could expect from clay, she gave in return.

And they are used, time after time, in the dialogue:

"Girls do not delight me," said Provence. "They appear to have no intermediate stage between the guileless chicken and the coquettish hen. . . . As for marriage, I fear it is a sadly over-rated blessing. Wives are either too much devil or too much angel. Fancy eating bacon every morning of one's life with a blameless creature who was dangling one-quarter of the way from heaven and three-quarters from earth! I should die of respect for her."

"And what if she were too much devil?"

"I should love her horribly," said Provence. "That is the worst of devils—they are so entirely adorable. . . ."

The cut-and-thrust of many of these sentences, and others resembling them, is reminiscent of Wilde. They have the ring of conversations from "Dorian Gray"—"Women treat us just as humanity treats its gods. They worship us, and are always bothering us to do something for them." The colour, however, with which that "picture" glows is lacking in Mrs. Craigie's books; to some readers her paradoxes and epigrams seem a shade inhuman. These remarks apply more particularly to the collection of her stories before us at the moment. Much of her other work is more sympathetic—there is a delicate, sad little scene in "The Gods, some Mortals, and Lord Wickenham" where Dr. Warre, married, meets Allegra, who belongs to his bachelor life, which will illustrate what we mean:

They had laughed aloud the comedy, and inly wept the tragedy of their fate.

"Good-bye," said he.

"Good-bye," she answered. "Will it be a cold drive home?"

"A very cold drive."

"And it must be a long while before I see you again?"

"Yes!"

"Good-bye. . . . Will there be a large fire in your study? Have you a chair you like?"

"Oh, yes!"

"I suppose she sits near you when you work?"

"Who?"

"Mrs. Warre."

"You mean Anne? . . . She has a number of friends; she goes to a lot of parties. She is very . . . bright."

"Good-bye!" This time he did not answer. When he had gone she stole about the room, moved the ornaments on the cabinet, shook the window curtains, and redraped them. She felt the housewife's instinct stir within her. Then she sat down on the floor, and drawing an old letter from her bosom, murmured it without once looking at the page. And she laid her head where Simon's foot had rested, and wept as little girls in the April of sorrow can weep.

This most recent re-issue of Mrs. Craigie's books includes her first novel, "Some Emotions and a Moral," "The Sinner's Comedy," "A Study in Temptations," and "A Bundle of Life." They nearly all touch sooner or later the poignant note of tragedy—the tragedy which from the point of view of Mr. Thomas Hardy and his "President of the Immortals" may be comedy: which reflection, as Mrs. Craigie tacitly admits, brings small comfort to the involuntary actors in the play. They each betray another notable characteristic of the author which we have left ourselves no space to exemplify further—a peculiar rapidity of motion in the story, a power of pressing to the point relentlessly, of excluding all extraneous matter, all futilities of conversation or obvious eking out of a situation. They are, in fact, as representative of the writer's more showy side as any that could have been selected; her finer, most sensitive aspect, where the art of fence is not, perhaps, so conspicuous, but the play of fancy is gentler and more seductive, we shall hope to see illustrated in a re-issue of her other stories. For, in a certain dexterity of attack and distinction of style, combined with clear-cut analysis of motives and emotions, the work of Mrs. Craigie can as yet nowhere be excelled, and will hardly, we think, be again equalled among authors of her own sex.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Holborn Hill. By CHRISTIAN TEARLE. (Mills and Boon, 6s.)

To introduce the heroine in the first chapter, at the age of seventeen, and then to say "and now, for the reader's enlightenment, we must put back the clock of our narrative;" to proceed to recount the birth of the young lady, afterwards catching up (at the end of 270 pages) with our first glimpse of her; and to conclude with a sweetheart and a prospective wedding when she is nineteen, is rather an antiquated method of telling a story, and a method which some west-country people would term "back-se-fore." We have an objection to it; it keeps the reader in expectation of a sudden return to the episode of the opening chapter, which for a hundred pages or so haunts him distractingly. And with this complaint we sum up the fault of the book—it is too digressive, and its transitions are not pleasing. The romance itself is charming and well written. The London of Nelson's day is brought vividly before us with more than usual skill. Many famous names are introduced—Admiral Collingwood, for one, and, less effectively, Boswell and Mrs. Garrick. Considerable humour is shown in the relation of events, and the characterisation is so good that it is a great pity the author did not elect to omit that unfortunately misleading first chapter, and tell his story from beginning to end in a straightforward manner.

A Comedy of Ambition. By A. GOWANS WHYTE. (Melrose, 6s.)

It is not often, in these days of illiterate writers and fatuous plots, that the word of enthusiasm is uttered at the close of a lengthy novel; neither is it a frequent experience among those whose business it is to sample the current fiction to be sorry that a story has ended. But by this remarkably good "Comedy of Ambition" the author has placed himself very highly in our regard, and has succeeded in bringing that pleasant enthusiasm and complimentary regret into existence.

The study of the principal character, Jack Gell, who, being intended for the ministry, frightens the prim little Scotch congregation into mild hysterics by an unorthodox sermon, and goes up to London only to become the tool of unscrupulous politicians, is one which must be followed with exceptional interest. To some readers the complications of his career as secretary to a member of Parliament will form the more attractive portion of the book; to ourselves the evolution of his emotional nature under the influence of three women appeals more strongly as a capable and unerring piece of work. His gradual separation from the cold Northern girl whom he thought he loved, his temporary infatuation with a brilliant and subtle society woman, and his final whole-hearted passion for Nina le Gallais strike us as precisely natural, and there is one chapter of the book, "Nina's Day," which forms an idyll we have read through twice for the pure pleasure and beauty of it. The rather sombre note of the hero's family troubles and political scrapes—for the laughter is very near to tears—is relieved by the introduction of a most charming French family domiciled in London, whose acquaintance Gell makes in quite an unconventional manner:

In a short, right-angled street, which lay within the confused area between Regent Street and Bond Street, he came upon the quaint figure of a child. She was standing bareheaded in a doorway, looking down the street with an intent gaze. . . . Each day as he passed he made a silent appeal to those large dark eyes. . . . One sunny day the child greeted him with a shy smile; and even at that critical moment Jack did not err. He bowed gravely, raised his hat, and passed on.

This is "Babette Angèle Josephine Marie Antoinette de Quedville," destined to become one of Jack's best friends, and she is one of the daintiest and most delightful little maidens we have met for a long time. The de Quedvilles, too, are entirely captivating. Monsieur, making comical and desperate love to his wife; Madame, adoring him and scorning his advances; and both of them worshipping Babette, form a picture which may be scanned many times without the discovery of a fault; the author could have given us a book about this united family alone, and we should not have complained. On the many other points of the story it is impossible to enlarge; suffice it to say that Mr. Whyte has evidenced his mastery of comedy: "the order of the smile, finely tempered, showing sunlight of the mind, mental richness rather than noisy enormity," as Mr. Meredith has put it; and that our readers will not have a moment's regret if they take our own pleasure in the book as forecasting theirs.

DANTE AND MUSIC

PERHAPS there never was a writer who was divided into three such intellectually distinct personalities as Dante. In reading his works we are forced again and again to distinguish between the poet, the man of learning and the politician. These three elements in his thought are represented singly in his three greatest "minor" works—the "Vita Nuova," the "Convito," and the "De Monarchia." But in the "Divina Commedia," his final expression, into which he put as much of himself as is to be found in all his other writings added together, he appears now as one, now as the other, and seems often to drop one personality and assume another with a suddenness that produces an almost shocking contrast. And from our mistaken modern point of view—mistaken, that is, in so far as it is always liable to keep Dante's aims out of our sight, and therefore to cause us to pass unintelligent and irrelevant judgments upon him—it often seems that he has wilfully robbed us of unsurpassable poetry in order to give us information in scholastic philosophy, history, or astronomy. Yet although we feel this deprivation, and may resent the presence of the scientific changelings which have taken the places we should wish to see occupied by the offspring of Dante the poet, at the same time we cannot help being interested in the enormous extent of Dante's knowledge. We say the extent of his knowledge advisedly, for the actual learning, if in itself interesting, may be read more conveniently in the sources whence he drew it. But by the repeated proofs of the wide range of his curious and heterogeneous learning—the harvest of a typically mediæval mind, which thinks in catalogues and enters, as it were, in its books every fact of interest that comes under its observation—a desire is at least aroused to make an inventory of all that Dante knew. Such inventories have, of course, been made, and it is a commonplace now to point out that technical and accurate allusions, according to the science of the time, can be found in his poem to such matters as astronomy (more perhaps than to any other branch of exact science), geometry, physiology, law and physics, in addition to the two chief arguments which run through the whole poem—namely, theology and politics. But there follows from this an enquiry that is perhaps not entirely futile: What did Dante not know? Were there any distinctly technical and learned subjects, much studied in or before Dante's time, of which he seems to know little or even shows actual ignorance? We think that music is such a subject.

It would, of course, be fruitless to attempt to prove Dante's ignorance of any particular subject merely on the ground that he does not display a knowledge of it. Such revelations of learning are purely incidental, and he must have learned, in the course of his life and his reading, many things which did not interest him sufficiently to make him wish to bring any allusions to them into his poem. But this is not the case with regard to music. We know that Dante was fond of music, and that he had friends among the musicians of his day; moreover the number of times that music is explicitly mentioned in the "Purgatorio and Paradiso" is considerable; it will certainly be an error on the side of under-statement if we put it at five-and-thirty or thereabouts. Now, if we take into account the state of music at the end of the Middle Ages—when secular music had already become separate from ecclesiastical, and had made a good start on its own development; when every part of the study, from the naming of the notes and questions of modality upwards, was treated in a highly technical and theoretical manner; and when the theorists were held in especially high esteem—an examination of those passages in which Dante makes mention of music will almost force us to the conclusion that not only did he know little or nothing of the theory of the art, but was not even a very observant listener.

Music in heaven we have been taught to expect; and Dante does not say anything to contradict popular tradition in this respect. But, to one interested in the theories of antiquity and the Middle Ages, how disappointing are his statements as to the celestial music! In the first canto of the "Paradiso" he had a splendid opportunity of an allusion which, had he been a musician, would have been after his own heart; he hears the music of the spheres. This, he tells us in three densely packed lines:—

. . . . In ruoba che tu [Dio] sempiterni
Desiderato, a sè mi fece atteso,
Con l'armonia che temperi e discerni.

This is a characteristic passage and a good example of the poet's allusive and technical manner of writing. But the allusion is not to anything connected with music, but to the well-known and constantly mentioned theory of the Primus Mobile. Now, it seems hardly possible that, if Dante had cared for such subjects, he could have mentioned the harmony of the spheres without showing belief or disbelief in the theory, still discussed in his time, that each planet in its movement emitted a single note. Moreover, if the theory appealed to him as true, we should have expected him to decide between the opinions, ascribed respectively to Cicero and Pythagoras, according to one of which the planets taken in order from the moon to Saturn gave an ascending scale from A to G, while according to the other it was a descending scale from D to E. Seeing that this grand opportunity is thus passed over, it does not surprise us to find that the other passages in which music in heaven is mentioned are mostly vague statements that music was performed, amounting to little more than stage-directions. A few instruments are mentioned, and where the wording is sufficiently precise we can tell that Dante was thinking in almost every case of secular song and dance music.

There is, however, one passage in the "Paradiso" which offers a strong contrast to the other vague references to music in heaven. It is in the scene in Canto XXIII., describing the glorification of the Virgin, where it is stated directly and simply that the hymn "Regina Coeli" was sung. And this reference to ecclesiastical music is an instance of the only manner in which Dante mentions music with sufficient definiteness to enable his readers to understand what it was that he heard; for, with one exception, all such references are to the liturgy. The first fragment of the liturgy to be found in the poem is in that most extraordinary of all lines, the first of Inferno XXXIV., which is put into the mouth of Virgil:—

Vexilla Regis prodeunt Inferni.

The shock conveyed by these words is no doubt intentional; as the torments of the lost souls reach their climax, Dante introduces the first words of the greatest of all songs of suffering. At the same time the true meaning of the words, coupled with the splendour of the music to which they are sung, can hardly fail to act as a forecast of comfort and a suggestion that after Hell will come Purgatory. Moreover, we are thus prepared in a measure for the singing by which we shall be arrested here and there in the next cantos of the poem:—

Ahi! quanto son diverse quelle foci
Dalle infernali; ch'è quivi per canti
S'entra, e laggiù per lamenti feroci.

In the "Purgatorio" there are, as it were, regular intervals for music, and as we make the ascent of the mountain we shall hear quite a long programme, from the chanting of simple texts from the gospels to the singing of "Te lucis ante terminum" by soloist and choir. Yet an examination of these musical passages will only lead us to think that Dante had but the vaguest idea of the differences between the various styles of singing employed in the rendering of the different parts of the liturgy. What are the expressions used by him to describe the singing which he heard? "Cantare" or simple periphrases with no more definite meaning in almost every case; and where he uses the word "pregare," referring to the "Agnus Dei," he is not any more precise, but, on the contrary, he is using a non-musical word to describe one of the most musically beautiful passages of the mass. If he had been versed in music, could he possibly have introduced as much of it into his poem and yet treated it invariably in this simple and detached manner? Would he not have brought in some characteristic allusive passages, with, perhaps, dark references to the Modes, and other indications of "inside" knowledge? Would he not have made it clear that he knew the exact nature of intoning, psalmody, syllabic and melismatic chant, hymnody, and a host of other matters? Could he possibly have resisted the temptation to make a technical allusion offered him by the very first piece of music which greets us on the lower slopes of the mountain—the tonus peregrinus, which triumphantly breaks the first rule of psalmody by being in a mixture of two modes and having consequently two reciting-notes? It seems next door to an impossibility that the poet who could make an accurate allusion, in one line, to the defect in the Julian calendar should have neglected such splendid openings as lay ready to his hand in the technicalities of music, if he had been familiar with them.

But we think it is possible to go further still, and to say that Dante attached no serious importance to music. The argument to prove this will be based, as before, upon omissions on the part of Dante, not on any of his statements; but the omissions are so great that they almost amount to an avowal by the poet of his lack of interest in music. In the first place, there is in the "Divina Commedia" no reference to St. Ambrose (unless, as is extremely unlikely, the "avvocato dei tempi cristiani" of Paradiso X. be he), and but one to Gregory the Great, and that containing no hint as to his place in the history of music. Charlemagne, again, was one of Dante's heroes; he was also one of the most eager and influential supporters of the true Gregorian tradition in liturgical music, and it was owing to his efforts that copies of the Roman manuscripts were brought into France and the Roman chant introduced into the French churches. Yet Dante, in referring to him, gives no intimation that he ever bestirred himself in any such matters. Later still, Guido d'Arezzo, Dante's countryman, and the most famous musician of the Middle Ages, the inventor to a large extent of modern notation and of the names of the notes, well known both as choir-master and theorist, author of the "Micrologus," might have received some attention at Dante's hands; yet he is not once mentioned. And so it is with others, men prominent in the history of music, from Boëthius to Thomas of Cellano, are either passed over in silence or else mentioned in quite other connections. Theories and discoveries which were attracting attention in Dante's day, such as those of the "mensuralists," with their "perfect" and "imperfect" time, find no echo in his poem. Musicians, as such, do not share in the rewards which await others in Paradise. The lovers have their place allotted to them in the sphere of Venus, the judges in Jove, the contemplatives in Saturn; but there is no place for the musicians, who yet might surely be considered to have done as good work as the "spiriti volivi mancanti," who are found in the first heaven. In the fourth and fifth heavens are placed the theologians and warriors, those who with their learning and with their strong right hands strove for the unity of the Faith; yet there is no recompense for those countless artists and students who contributed by their genius to the glorifying of the liturgy and by their patient labours to the unity of the Roman rite. Music may be a pleasing accomplishment, but it is not a virtue.

There is one musical passage in the "Purgatorio" to which it is pleasant to return at the end; for in it we see Dante honouring a musician and showing us at the same time a glimpse of his own familiar life; we mean the passage in Purgatorio II., where the poets meet Dante's friend Casella, the musician, who begins to sing:—

Amor, che nella mente mi ragiona
Della mia donna.

This song by Casella has been much discussed, and it was long ago pointed out these "canzoni morali" were never set to music; therefore, adds the commentator, "I believe that this Amor, che nella mente mi ragiona was the first line of some ballata or song." But this is an unconvincing explanation, as this canzone, the second of the "Convito," was a favourite with Dante, and he quotes the first line of it in the "De Vulgari Eloquentia." It is also highly improbable that Dante was so ignorant that he did not know which kinds of poems were set to music and which were not. It seems to us that Casella's song must simply be classed with the rest of the music of the "Purgatorio." Dante's idea, then, in putting these words into the mouth of the sweet singer would have been to show that, as on earth a love-song was sung to a secular tune, so on the shores of the mountain of purification a "canzone morale," a poem of higher class and graver meaning, might be sung to a plain chant melody, whose gravity should be fitting to the place and consistent with the import of the words.

PUN

No satisfactory etymology has been proposed for this word, which appears shortly after 1660. About the same date there was, as I learn from the proofs of the New English Dictionary, communicated to me by the Editor, a synonym pundigrion. Richardson derives pun from F. pointe, which is phonetically impossible. At the same time its correspondence in meaning with pointe makes ultimate connection seem not improbable. The pointe, name and thing, appears in F. in the 16th century. It corresponds to the It. concello ("Jadis de nos auteurs les pointes ignorées Furent de l'Italie en nos vers attirées" Boileau), and is, in its simplest form, a verbal quibble; e.g., Furetière gives, as an example, from the theologian Caussin, "Les hommes ont bâti la Tour de Babel, et les femmes la Tour de Babil," which is about on a level with the ordinary Shakespearean pun. The earliest L. dictionaries to record pun (Littleton, Coles) gloss it allusio, allusivulus. Addison defines it as a "conceit," and Boyer (1742) gives "pointe d'esprit (pensée subtile, jeu de mots), a quibble or quibbling, a clench, pun, joke, wit, witty conceit, or fancy," and "pun (or quibble), pointe, pointe d'esprit, recontre, jeu de mots." The constant occurrence of "quibble" in the 18th century definitions of pun (Bailey, Johnson, Dyche and Pardon, Barlow, and the Latin dictionaries) seems to show that the word originally had a somewhat wider meaning, including the idea of making over-subtle distinctions, "clenches" (Spitzfindigkeit), as well as of merely playing on words (Wortspiel). It. punto and puntiglio were both used in this sense. Valentini (1834) has "puntiglio (cavillazione, sofisticheria), die Spitzfindigkeit, Grübeleien, Wortklauberei"; Cardinali (1852) has "puntiglio, cavillazione, sottigliezza nel ragionare e nel disputare," and "punto, . . . s'usa anche per cavillazione, sofistichessa, sottigliezza di invenzione, puntiglio." The Voc. della Crusca gives an example in this sense from Vincenzo Borghini (1584), "Voler far forza in su questo sarebbe più presto puntiglio, e sottigliezza, che real disputa, e combatter de' nomi, non della cosa." It glosses the word by "cavillatio, σόφισμα." Veneroni (1714) has "puntiglio, pointille, Spitzfindigkeit*, argutia." Ainsworth (1736) has "argutor, to pun, to take words otherwise than spoken." There seems to be sufficient similarity in the meaning of pun and puntiglio to make connection possible, and this possibility appears to be strengthened by the history of the cognate F. pointe. Of the two words pun and pundigrion, there can be little doubt that the latter is nearer the original. An E. derivative pundigrion from pun is impossible, while the coming, at about the same period, of such clipped forms as cil, mob, etc., is in favour of pun being short for pundigrion. I am aware that to derive pundigrion from It. puntiglio requires a somewhat active imagination. It may, however, have been an illiterate attempt at reproducing the It. spelling. That there is ultimate connection with punto I am convinced.

Proceedings at the meeting held April 23rd, 1909:

Dr. C. Chree, F.R.S., President, in the Chair.

A paper by Prof. W. H. Bragg and Mr. J. L. Glasson, "On a want of Symmetry shown by Secondary X-rays," was read by Prof. Bragg. When a primary X-ray strikes an atom, a secondary X-ray sometimes starts out from the place of impact. The experiments described in the paper were made with the object of comparing the intensity of emission of the secondary X-ray in a direction making an angle of about 45° with the primary with the intensity in a direction making an angle of 135°, and therefore turning back almost completely. It was found that in the case of atoms of platinum, tin or aluminium, or of such light atoms as are contained in celluloid, the former was larger than the latter, being sometimes three times as great. Madsen has obtained similar, but much greater, inequalities in the case of the γ -rays. When atoms of copper or iron were tested, atoms which give rise to a very soft radiation, there was little inequality. A similar inequality effect also occurs in the case of β -rays. On the original pulse theory, calculation showed that there should be no inequality of the secondary X-radiation in any case. If that theory were abandoned, as most writers now agreed to do, and the X-rays were supposed to be bundles of energy travelling through space, there did not appear to be sufficient definition of such entities as would enable any comparison to be made between theory and experiment. If the rays were supposed to be material, the facts were generally in agreement with expectation and afforded another instance of close parallelism between the phenomena of the X- and the γ -rays.

Prof. C. H. Lees said that Prof. Bragg had given a lucid account of his theories of γ - and X-rays. His researches would make physicists more careful in accepting the æther-pulse theory. He asked if it was likely that better means would be devised to discriminate between various forms of γ - and X-rays than dividing them into "hard" and "soft" radiations. He thought many discrepancies could be attributed to this want of discrimination.

Mr. C. A. Sadler pointed out that whatever lack of symmetry might exist in the emergence and incidence secondary X-radiations from a plate of a substance which was a source of scattered primary radiations, Professor Bragg's results conclusively proved that such lack of symmetry did not exist when the plate was a source of homogeneous radiation. If, then, it was a necessary condition of Professor Bragg's theory that such lack of symmetry should exist with secondary X-radiations, we must either conclude that the theory here breaks down or that these homogeneous radiations are not X-radiations as usually understood. It was to be noted also that the measured lack of symmetry (ignoring the lack of symmetry in the case of homogeneous beams, which had been shown to be only apparent) in the most pronounced cases was small compared with those obtained with γ -rays.

Prof. Bragg, referring to the remarks of Prof. Lees, said that for precision the actual speed of all electrons ought to be measured. Instead of measuring the speed the penetrating power might be determined.

A paper entitled "Transformations of X-rays" was read by Mr. C. A. Sadler. It has been shown that the members of the group of metals Chromium—Silver emit under suitable primary beams radiations which are homogeneous and which increase in penetrating power with increase of atomic weight of the radiator. Using these homogeneous beams, the tertiary radiation excited by them in other metals has been studied by the author. It was found that the tertiary radiation excited in any member of the group Cr—Ag was homogeneous, and its penetrating power was that characteristic of the radiation from the substance when excited by a primary beam. With any given tertiary radiator it was found that the intensity of the homogeneous type of radiation emitted when the homogeneous radiations from the members of the group Cr—Ag successively fell upon the radiator was inappreciable unless the exciting radiation was more penetrating than that characteristic of the radiator. Defining a quantity k such that the fraction of the energy of the secondary beam passing normally through a thin layer δx of the tertiary radiator which was transformed in tertiary radiation $= k\delta x$, it was found that as long as the penetrating power of the secondary beam was less than that characteristic of the tertiary radiator, k was sensibly zero. When the secondary beam became more penetrating than that characteristic of the tertiary radiator, k increased rapidly to a maximum and then decreased over a considerable range, with increase of penetrating power of the secondary, as a linear function of the ionisation produced in a thin layer of air by the secondary beam. It has been shown that when the characteristic radiation is excited in a substance, a corresponding increase in the absorption of the exciting radiation by that substance takes place. If λ' denote the increase in the value of the absorption coefficient of the exciting beam by the material of the tertiary radiator consequent upon the emission of the tertiary radiation, k/λ' was found to decrease slowly at first and then more rapidly as the exciting beam became more penetrating.

Prof. Bragg congratulated the author on his interesting experiments, and said he could not see any satisfactory explanation of them on the pulse theory.

A paper on the "Theory of the Alternate Current Generator," by Professor Lyle, was read by Dr. Russell. The author points out that the theory of armature reaction as ordinarily discussed by electricians is unsatisfactory, as an important effect due to the mutual induction between the current in the field winding and the current in the armature circuit is neglected. To simplify the problem, the case of a simple ironless single-phase alternator is first discussed. The magnetic field, supposed uniform, is due to the current in a fixed coil connected with a source of constant electromotive force, and the armature is a coil of wire rotated in this field with constant angular velocity. In these circumstances, we may suppose that the mutual inductance between the two circuits varies in accordance with the harmonic law. The differential equations which determine the values of the two currents are easily written down, but their solution presents difficulty. The author gives a method of getting the complete solution. He first assumes that both the currents can be expanded in Fourier Series. He then applies a novel vector method and obtains equations to determine the value of the harmonic of any order in terms of the constant term in the field current. The operators in these equations are infinite determinants, but he shows how these can be readily reduced to continued fractions. In practice, the resistance of the exciting circuit is small compared with its inductance, and thus the time constant is large. The continued fraction operators therefore rapidly become recurring, and so the equations giving the solution are simple.

The results prove that only odd harmonics appear in the expression for the armature current, and only even harmonics appear in the expression for the field current. The frequency of the induced ripple superposed on the exciting current is, therefore, double the fundamental frequency. The interesting fact is proved that this ripple is asymmetric—that is, the positive half of the wave is of a different shape from the negative half. A simple geometrical method of obtaining the solution is also given.

The author next takes into account the effects of hysteresis and eddy currents. This he does by means of the permeability operators, the use of which he explained in the Phil. Mag. for January, 1905. The magnetic leakage of the armature is also taken into account. As a practical illustration of the method, the operation of a small two-pole alternator when supplying a non-inductive load is predetermined. A diagram is given showing the exact shape of the current wave in the armature, the ripple superposed on the exciting current, and their relative phase displacement.

The action of "dampers" in diminishing the heat-losses in the field circuit and the theory of the synchronous motor are also discussed.

Mr. W. Duddell expressed his interest in Prof. Lyle's paper, and remarked that the results which he had obtained were in accord with experiments made by himself and Dr. Marchant some years ago.

Dr. Russell congratulated the author on having obtained such instructive solutions of the differential equations which determine the value of the armature and field currents in a simple generator. The subject of armature reaction has been carefully studied by electrical engineers, and the literature of the subject is quite extensive. He referred in particular to the study made by Professor Blondel in 1900 of the ripples in the exciting current of a two-phase and a three-phase alternator. It was well known that in a single-phase machine the frequency of the ripple superposed on the exciting current by the alternate magnetising and demagnetising effect of the armature current was double the frequency of the armature current. This ripple disappears at no load, but in practice the ripples at no load are often very marked owing to pulsations of the reluctance due to slots in the armature. The latter ripples are much less pronounced at full load as the load circuit acts like a damping-coil; but new ripples due to the armature reaction appear, causing a distortion of the wave-form. As a rule, electrical engineers assumed the existence of a sine wave of armature current and then investigated the ampere-turns to be added or subtracted from the field coils so as to neutralise the magnetising or demagnetising effect produced. In this connection Blondel's two-reaction method was extensively used, as it enabled approximate values to be rapidly obtained. The effect of the reaction on the wave-form of the machine, however, had been practically neglected, and Professor Lyle deserves great credit for his solution. In connection with the parallel running of turbo-alternators it was important, and the theory deserved careful study by engineers. The speaker thought that "dampers" were mainly used to prevent phase-swinging. He agreed with Professor Hopkinson that a similar effect might often be more economically produced by putting more copper on the field windings. The difficulties that arose in connection with perfecting the theory of synchronous motors arose mainly from the difficulty of taking hysteresis into account in the mathematical equations. He thought that Professor Lyle's work in this direction was most valuable.

Prof. L. R. Wilberforce exhibited a galvanometer of the Broca pattern suitable for general use in elementary laboratories.

SOCIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

On May 4th, at the Society's rooms, 24 Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C., Mr. C. Delisle Burns read a paper on "The Religious Order," Mr. S. H. Swinny presiding.

The religious order, said the lecturer, was the attempt to unite men or women in social service of a spiritual kind. Its basis was the inspiration of its members, not ordination. Its practice in retirement from the world was intended for service to the world. The history of religious orders in the West showed three chief stages. In the first, or Benedictine, phase the order was devoted to influencing the world from outside. In the earlier period the Benedictines stood for culture in general; but after the reforms of Cluny and the Chartreuse, religion came to mean a more purely emotional enthusiasm. The second stage was represented by the Friars, by whom the attempt was made to bring the cloister into contact with the world through preaching. The third and last stage was that during which the Jesuits rose to power and the special object of the religious order became the teaching of the young. With this was connected a restricted meaning of the word "religion" and a controversial attitude towards the Northern interpretation of Christianity. The religious order produced spiritual aristocracies. A tradition of high ideals was preserved, and the aristocracy had a democratic basis, anyone with a "vocation" being enabled to attain to power. The decay of the order was due to the mistake of celibacy, the narrowed meaning of religion, and the severance of the spiritual from the temporal.

CORRESPONDENCE

POETS' PROSE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In the last issue of THE ACADEMY, amongst the interesting articles which I read, two things particularly caught my attention: the suggestion of your correspondent, who signs himself "E. Owen," under the title of "The King's English," and the following sentence in your article on "The Commercial Muse": "Any man who can write really good poetry can also write good prose."

I fully endorse Mr. Owen's suggestion. I think that something should be done towards helping the working classes in England to improve their language, which is sometimes unintelligible, in spite of the money that is so liberally spent by tax-payers on education in this country.

With regard to your opinion as to men who can be at the same time good poets and good prose writers, I respectfully beg to state that I do not share it. My long experience in connection with philological as well as some other questions, has taught me that Blair is right when he says that, "The rays of the mind must converge to one point in order to glow intensely." When I am told that an intelligent man has attempted to study several subjects, I immediately think of the pocket-knife spoken of by Smiles in his "Self-Help." I shall even go the length of saying that, whenever I see half a dozen letters of the alphabet after a University man's name, I cannot help regretting that such a powerful mind should have been forced into University grooves.

Now, before I speak of poets and prose writers, I will take two examples from animal life to illustrate my meaning:

Is a good racehorse generally a good trotter, and vice versa?

Can a flying-fish swim as fast as an ordinary fish, or fly as swiftly as an ordinary bird? As it is with animals, so it is with men. A good violinist is generally a poor 'cellist, and vice versa; no artist can expect to excel in both of these instruments; as it is with the different branches of music, so it is with poetry and prose. A good poet, to my mind, is very seldom a good prose-writer. Let us take at random two of the English writers, who attempted poetry and prose, Walter Scott and Macaulay. When the former read Byron's poetry, and compared it with his own, he decided that he must resign the first place in poetry to his young rival. With regard to Macaulay, if he had kept to verse his prose would not have been, up to the present day, the delight of millions of linguists.

Now, let us speak of French literature. Molière felt, at a certain moment, that he could never be a good poet and a good prose writer at the same time; he gave up verse and wrote masterpieces in prose.

If Voltaire had been a greater poet than he was, we might not have had one of the most delightful works ever written in prose, "Charles XII. of Sweden." As Morley says, "Voltaire is the very genius of correctness, elegance, and grace; but in masculine energy and in poetic weightiness, as well as in organ-like richness of music, Voltaire must be surely pronounced inferior to the great author of Cinna and Polyeucte." Corneille, himself, if he succeeded—whilst rendering noble feelings—in using, as Mr. Faguet has it, "le langage le plus mâle, le plus énergique, le plus sobre à la fois et le plus plein qui ait été parlé en France," is it not, perhaps, because, in expressing himself in ordinary prose, he was, say Bessou and Elwall, "un écrivain très inégal, écrivant parfois d'un style pénible et obscur quand il exprimait des idées ordinaires."

In short, let us take two of the greatest poets of the nineteenth century: Hugo and Lamartine. Can their prose be compared to their admirable verse? What is virtue in the latter is vice in the former.

They wrote poetical prose, which may be prized in a speech, but which is certainly a defect in expressing common things in writing. It is quite as bad to write poetical prose as to write verses containing no poetry in them as Boileau did; the former is as ridiculous as a man who puts on his evening dress to partake of a quiet dinner, with only his wife and children as guests; the latter is like the difference between a dahlia and a rose. In point of physical beauty, they may be equal, but its want of perfume will always place the dahlia much beneath the queen of flowers.

To conclude, I beg to say that none of the French writers, who tried both prose and poetry, has ever excelled in prose as Renan and About did.

As a counterpoise to Morley's delight in thinking that Racine taught Fénelon and Massillon "how to make music in their prose," any French critic would feel disposed to say that, "l'auteur du chef-d'œuvre de l'esprit humain," would have been more useful to these very writers, had he taught them how to write in verse masterpieces like his "Athalie."

A FRENCH LINGUIST.

JIMMY DOUGLAS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In a recent number of your stimulating paper you administered a well-deserved chastisement to that "star" comedian, Mr. James Douglas. This gentleman has, it seems, a bad habit of treating the readers of the journals to which he has the honour to be a contributor to articles on men and institutions, which to many doubtless appear the quintessence of wisdom, but which are, in fact—as you have demonstrated—the reverse. In one of his recent articles Mr. Douglas turns the searchlight of his erudition on the drama. He rejoices exceedingly that we are within measurable distance of a Repertory Theatre; he warmly congratulates Mr. Frohman on his approaching marriage with the unconventional drama; and he hastens to enrich our already overburdened language with the beautiful term Frohmanity. Then he proceeds in his unmitigated Daily Mail way to sketch in the beauties of the drama under its new conditions. Here is what Mr. Douglas, in his own wearisome word-whirling way, asks of the "New" Drama:—

"Give us life neat. . . . Give us. . . . the thunder of its wheels in the mire, the music of its hoofs in the mud. . . . Out-Shaw Shaw! Drag into light every new kind of snob and cad, every novel vulgarity and vice." The dramatist must turn to the newspaper for inspiration for, "The journalist is the jackal of the theatre. . . . a spoonful of news contains a sea of drama." He deprecates the waste of human dramatic material. "Why does nobody put Horatio Bottomley on the stage? Or Joe Lyons? Or Mr. Tree? Or John Burns? Or Rockefeller? Or Abdul the Undamned? Or Maud Allan?" (And Heaven knows who besides.) "They are a joy to me. . . . It is sinful to waste our fellow creatures. . . . Hall Caine. . . . and Marie Corelli are more than ripe for the footlights. . . . Why are they boycotted? . . . And why is Smyth-Pigott, that chef d'œuvre, why, oh why, is he ignored?"

In these brief extracts from three columns of unutterable nonsense one thing is obvious, a disposition, shared by many amiable and half-educated critics to regard the new drama in its only possible form as the drama of the dregs. The tendency is the result of the recent revolt against romanticism. It is the outcome of a theory that the function of the drama is to mirror real life, i.e., life as it is, and this in spite of the well-known fact that we, none of us, know what life really is, and the drama can never mirror real life, but life plus the personality of the author, actors, and producer, and coloured by the prejudices and passions of the audience. There are signs, however, that this ill-conceived theory is breaking down. The New Idealism betrays tokens of its proximity. The wave of romanticism is returning, but in a more truly ennobling and original form. It bears on its crest a drama which is, indeed, a national drama, but one which is designed to show us what national life means in its widest and best sense; to perpetuate its finer ideas and ideals; to reveal the memory and aspiration of the race; to express the true philosophy and in this the poetry of national life. This is the drama which the Repertory Theatre will be asked to foster, and not the cesspool of realism which the extravagant and perishable English of such writers as Mr. Douglas would bolster into popularity.

KAIRON GNOTHI.

HOW THE LAW FAVOURS WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—There is a curious mistake in the article under this title in to-day's ACADEMY. Referring to the Slander of Women Act, 1891, the writer says: "A woman bringing such an action can certainly recover no more damages than costs unless she has specially suffered." It is really just the other way: she cannot, unless the judge certifies to the contrary, recover more costs than damages. As a matter of fact, a woman suing under this Act not only can, but usually does, recover a substantial sum as damages, without having suffered any special damage whatever.

TEMPLE.

"MALARIA AND GREEK HISTORY."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In your review of my book, "Malaria and Greek History," you blame the Manchester University Press for omitting, in the Bibliography, the Christian names of authors. The fault was mine, and I am sorry for it. I compiled the Bibliography myself, and my only excuse for the omission is that I had no difficulty in finding a book when I knew its date, its title, and the surname of the author. A reference to "Kühn" always means, in my book, that the quotation is taken from Kühn's edition of the Hippocratic "Corpus." This I do state in the Preface.

I should also like to express my regret that in the Preface I lay undue stress upon the decline of the Greeks. My book is mainly concerned with the efforts made by the Greeks to counteract the influence of their unhealthy environment. This theme can be discussed quite independently of the introduction of malaria or of the date at which the race began to decline.

I trust that my faulty treatment of the interesting question to which Major R. Ross first called attention will not do harm to what may prove a valuable branch of historical study. "Ecrire l'histoire de la malaria," writes the Egyptologist, W. Groff, "serait presque écrire celle de l'humanité."

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

Never in the history of publishing has a magazine with such a splendid list of contributors been placed straight away on the market.
 It has taken years for the majority of the leading magazines to reach anywhere near where Nash's Magazine begins. Nash's Magazine is a gigantic undertaking: the paper used for No. 1 would, if unrolled, stretch from London to Edinburgh—a distance of over 400 miles. Its policy will be to give to the public each month a magazine containing stories by the world's most famous novelists.

(1) SO VERY HUMAN

By VICTORIA MAITLAND, Author of "The Hub of Life."
The novel cannot fail to entrance all who read it.

(2) THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

By HOPE PROTHIERE, Author of "One Man's Sin."
It is a book that everyone should read and recommend; it is at times comic, dramatic, and sensational.

(3) A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.
A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story.

By the Author of "The Log of a Sailorman."

(4) OVER BRAVE BLUE SEAS

By WILL BROOKE. [Shortly.]

In his new work Mr. Will Brooke presents a realistic account of a sailor's life; his wanderings and adventures by land and sea from the time of his first voyage in a sailing vessel until he obtains command of an ocean-going steamship. The toil, the strife, the humour and pathos of life on the great waters are depicted in intensely vivid and striking language. A sailor by profession,
Mr. Brooke has gifts of insight, imagination, observation and description that are usually associated only with the born storyteller.

THE BOOK OF THE WEEK

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

The Daily Chronicle says: "Mr. Buxton had an opportunity of seeing and hearing things in the best quarter for information, and the result, whether or not it be history as time will finally write, is a very vivid, picturesque account of the transformation of Turkey."

The Bookman says: "A very definite value is attached to this timely volume, for the author of it—a keen student of the East and Eastern affairs—had the good fortune to be in Turkey both shortly before and shortly after the Revolution, and his pages are as stirring as scenes upon a stage. . . . Whatever our own judgments or shade of politics, we can gain only good from this enthusiastic and graphic account of a fiery piece of history."

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM

By Canon and Mrs. BARNETT. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Sunday Chronicle says: "Everything that the Barnetts write on Social Reform is worth reading, for they are among the very few social reformers who know what they are writing about."

OLIVE IN ITALY

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "Mr. Fisher Unwin has introduced many new writers of good fiction in his 'First Novel' Series. We venture to think that Moray Dalton will take high rank in the list. 'Olive in Italy' is vivid and picturesque, and the writer has a rare sense of the inevitable nature of real tragedy. The name 'Moray Dalton' on the cover of a second book should ensure an instant welcome."

LIFE AND LETTERS

MR. R. J. CAMPBELL appears to be getting on rather badly with his new religion. For our own part we are not sorry. New religions are doubtful affairs nowadays, and we have never been able to conceive Mr. Campbell in the figure of a prophet. That he is an ingenious young gentleman cannot be doubted, inasmuch as, while he takes to himself the credit of having put a new religion on the market, he would appear still to be preaching an old religion which was invented by somebody else. According to the hapenny reporters Mr. Campbell has just been telling a vast audience at the City Temple that, "theoretically speaking, materialism is dead or moribund; practically we are enmeshed in it." This is the old, old cock-and-bull story with a vengeance. Mr. Campbell is reported to have said, further, that:

There was none of the old-time confidence in God, none of the old-time sweet hope of immortality, but strange misgivings as to whether there might be a goal of human endeavour or not, or whether they were like a ship without a rudder drifting at midnight on a stormy sea.

Which, of course, is as cheerful as it is untrue. The people who put forward "new" and disintegrating assertions in the name of religion invariably talk like this. They write a book which is destructive of belief and imagine that they have destroyed faith. They observe that a mad poet has proclaimed the non-existence of spirit and the triumph of matter and they say: "There you have the opinion of the world." It does not seem to occur to Mr. Campbell that his talk comes straight out of his own heart. He has shown himself to be full of doubts and "strange misgivings," and while he may be loth to cut the painter, as it were, there can be no getting away from the fact that he belongs to the dinghy, and not to the big ship. Without knowing it, perhaps, he is a materialist of the materialists, and the higher and nobler parts of religion stick in his gorge. He is infected with Socialism, which is simply squalid materialism. He mixes up religion with politics, and he tells us that "poverty and privilege must go," and that "the spiritual unity of the race is unrealisable until they do go." Which is arrant nonsense. Poverty is the rule of life for quite ninety-nine persons out of every hundred. Even in Mr. Campbell's own walk of life there are many thousands of poverty-stricken persons, who still manage to love God and their fellow-men, even if they cannot drive to their churches in motor-cars. And as for the spiritual unity of the race, it exists and cannot be talked or preached or doggerelised away by any man or any number of men. Mr. Campbell wants to be "practical." He is a benevolent gentleman, and he would be glad for everybody to fare sumptuously and travel smoothly and keep a pew and an air-cushion at the City Temple. It is not to his discredit to be so benevolently disposed. But the Author of the Universe is not so benevolently disposed, which fact makes an end of R. J. Campbell. Mr. Campbell himself is much better off than the Christ, whose Divinity he is understood not to recognise. It is pleasant to find that his modest share of this world's goods has not hardened his heart against the poor. Let him go on loving the poor and thus save his soul.

And as for privilege, Mr. Campbell can no more abolish privilege than he can abolish poverty. He is a privileged person himself, and it is certain that he is not likely to abolish himself. The Socialists cannot abolish privilege, nor do they really wish to abolish it. All they want is a shifting of privilege from, say, the shoulders of the Duke of Marlborough to the shoulders of Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. Grayson. And even then they would not be satisfied, and, looking round for fresh fields to conquer, they would demand the privilege of Mr. R. J. Campbell. In point of fact, we are all privileged, if only to the extent of having in our midst a man like Campbell. So far as we are able to make out, there has been privilege since the world began. It is as necessary to human persons as breath is necessary. Mr. Campbell knows that he cannot destroy it, and that is why he squeals. The misuse of privilege is, of course, a different affair. And we should not be sorry to have Mr. Campbell's precise views on this division of a pleasing question. For Mr. Campbell appears to us to have been an expert in the misuse of privilege ever since we can remember him.

The tremendous sums of money realised by the sale of the late Mr. Justice Day's pictures will set the mouths of His Majesty's judges watering furiously. Mr. Justice Day collected pictures in the way of a hobby. He does not appear to have purchased anything that was really expensive. On the other hand, for a capital outlay of probably much less than ten thousand pounds, he acquired "works" which have sold after his death for seventy-five thousand pounds. Which, on the whole, is business. We believe that practically every judge of the High Court has a hobby. Mr. Justice Grantham, for example, is an amateur architect; Mr. Justice Darling is an amateur wit; and it is understood that the Lord Chief Justice of England is a great hand with a part-song, and in his motion like an angel sings, still quiring to the young-eyed Cherubim—in a parish church of a Sunday. These are, of course, blameless and human employments. On the other hand, they are distinctly not business. Mr. Justice Grantham's architectural efforts will of a surety never bring to his executors such a plum as seventy-five thousand pounds. Mr. Justice Darling's mirth is bestowed on shrieking ushers and giggling reporters without money and without price, and after his lordship's demise, which we sincerely trust may be long deferred, even the most excruciating of his scintillae will not be worth more than the usual penny-a-line or, at the most, twopence; while as for the vocal exercises of the Lord Chief Justice we shall be unable to obtain them for love or money one hundred years hence, unless, happily, someone bottles them off in a phonograph. The facts we have stated should give the King's judges pause. There is a little book called "The Breeding and Rearing of Canaries for Pleasure and Profit." We have not "perused" (vide bills of costs) this excellent volume, but its title serves to indicate that it is really possible to combine pleasure with profit. And hence we venture with great respect to suggest to Mr. Justice Grantham that a little judicious stamp-collecting will serve his executors more surely than the Grantham style of architecture. Hence it is also that we venture to suggest to Mr. Justice Darling, with equal respect, that there is more money in old china than in old jokes. And to the Lord Chief Justice of England, with still greater respect, we will say, in the pathetic words of Miss Kitty Gordon, now showing at the Pavilion: "Sing, sing, let your heart sing—we don't care!"

The current number of the Sphere contains some nasty gibes. By way of inviting the intelligent to be duly fearful of "the All-Seeing Eye of the Camera" Mr. Shorter prints a quarter-page picture of a gentleman who is alleged lately to have robbed a bank, and displays beneath it the appended beautiful legend:

How "D. S. Windell" Avoided the Camera in the Street, but could Not Evade it (though under the Eyes of the Law) in the Dock at Bow Street.

The All-Seeing Eye of the Camera is truly a wonderful affair. Some day, perhaps, the all-seeing eye of criticism will get hold of Mr. Shorter and prove to him that what he may avoid in the Sphere he cannot evade elsewhere. Meanwhile, Mr. Shorter puts a pertinent question and proceeds to answer it:

Who also is the "chief" of one "very popular weekly" in this country who is "fond of posing as the guide, philosopher, and friend of the literary aspirant"? This from a correspondent of The Author, who has sent him three copies of "a slim booklet of poems which was never even acknowledged in the weekly book lists." Perhaps the author would have had his book acknowledged if he had simply addressed it to "the editor."

The acumen and shrewdness herein displayed delights us all. But there is other matter in the Author which in a small way, at any rate, concerns Mr. Shorter in his office as a journalist; the which, as is his wont, he treats with the far-famed Shorter brand of "silent contempt."

We should be sorry, however, to be unjust to Mr. Clement Shorter, but we note that he tops up his current literary letter with a picture of Dante and a notice of what he calls a "Great New Book." Then he proceeds to say his say about the Quarterly Review, and on the whole we agree with his say. But the Shorter must ever be Shorter; and our friend's fairly obvious comment on the old Quarterly is rounded off as follows:

Personally, I am inclined to disapprove of the signed article, which I would like to see everywhere else but in The Quarterly—why would take me too long to tell. Certainly one might have had a little interest in the article on poetry—dull and wrong-headed though it be—had one not found the signature of the Poet Laureate at the end of it.

Now, we happen to have read the Poet Laureate's article in the Quarterly Review, and we challenge Mr. Shorter to justify his epithets "dull and wrong-headed." In point of fact, Mr. Alfred Austin's article happens in the main to be a particularly sound and just article, and in any case it exhibits a knowledge of the true inwardness of poetry and of its true value and nature which far exceeds anything we have ever been able to discover in the writings of Mr. Shorter. Mr. Shorter tells us quite truly that Gifford and Croker were cruel, unfair and deliberately dishonest, and that in his judgment they were horrible people. We will not say that Mr. Shorter is deliberately dishonest; because we believe that he knows no better. But there can be no doubt that when he describes the Laureate's article in the current Quarterly as "dull and wrong-headed" he is wittingly or unwittingly just as cruel and unfair as Croker or Gifford ever knew how to be. We are not now discussing Mr. Austin's poetry or Mr. Austin's prose in the bulk; but simply his article on poetry in the current Quarterly Review. Mr. Shorter may have found that article dull; and he has a perfect right to say that it is dull if he chooses; but "wrong-headed" is an epithet which Mr. Shorter has no business to use unless he can justify it. Space in the Sphere being so occupied with advertisements of Eno's Fruit Salt and the Nugget Boot Polish, we have again to offer Mr. Shorter space in THE ACADEMY and our usual rates of payment, if he cares to justify himself in this matter. But he is one of those critics who make wild charges against people, and on being invited to substantiate those charges immediately seek refuge in the beautiful old adage to the effect that silence is golden. "Blame, blame, Clemmy, my boy!"

Our enjoyment of the performance which we witnessed a few days since of "The Earth," at the Kingsway Theatre, and our appreciation of the able acting of Miss Lena Ashwell and Mr. Aynesworth, and the other members of Miss Lena Ashwell's company, were somewhat marred by the feeling forced upon us that the author of the play had written it to fit the political and sociological views of Miss Lena Ashwell quite as much as her histrionic talents. The villain of the piece, the proprietor of the newspaper The Earth, and of a vast number of other newspapers and periodicals, is represented as being engaged by means of "his enormous influence" over his vast number of readers in "forming public opinion" against a measure, which is described as "The Wages Bill." We are not given any definite information as to the nature of the "Wages Bill," but we are left to infer that it is the sort of Bill which might be produced by the combined efforts of Mrs. Pankhurst, Mr. Keir Hardie and General Booth; and Mr. Aynesworth, whose brilliant abilities were unable to carry him through a part (that of Trevena) which requires him to indulge in vague sentimentality and generally to look and speak like a fool, represented, we suppose, the hero of the play. That is to say, he is making love to another man's wife under the usual specious pretences, and when the proprietor of The Earth tries to blackmail him into abandoning "The Wages Bill," by threatening to expose him to the injured husband, we are invited to admire him because he is prepared to sacrifice a measure which he considers of vital importance to the whole country, and especially to women and children, rather than be instrumental in compromising and bringing disgrace upon the lady with whom he is carrying on an intrigue. Of course, anyone in the position of Mr. Trevena would probably have been obliged to have come to the same conclusion; but there is nothing particularly interesting either in the situation or in the steps which he proposes to take in face of that situation. Lady Killone, whose husband we have been shown in the first act in the figure of a quite improbably red-faced and drunken Irish peer, who grinds his tenants, at this juncture, however, refuses to allow "The Wages Bill" to be sacrificed to save her reputation, which, considering that her only object in life is to get rid of her husband and live with her lover, is not altogether quite such a high-souled piece of self-sacrifice as the author of the piece and Miss Lena Ashwell would have us believe.

What irritates us about the play is that it is far more of a tract than a play, and that the stupid device is adopted of making all the people who are opposed to "The Wages Bill" rogues and blackguards. At the end of the play one is left with the uncomfortable conclusion that "The Wages Bill," which is evidently a foolish, sentimental, socialistic and probably suffragistic measure, conceived in the brain of a man of third-rate intellectual powers, is to be foisted on the community, while Lady Killone is to be at liberty to continue her little games undisturbed and with an added opinion of her own marvellous goodness and greatness. Another absurdity of the play was the quite unnecessary advertisement given to the prototype in real life of Sir Felix Janion, the owner of The Earth. In real life the owners of such papers do not possess any serious influence as moulders of public opinion. They are able to popularise a new form of idiot game or boom into a three days' prominence entirely uninteresting and unimportant people, but that is the extent of their influence. This is not to deny that their publications have a pernicious and degrading influence on the mental powers of their countrymen; but to do their countrymen justice, when it comes to matters of real importance, the opinions of such journals as The Earth are absolutely without weight. Nobody takes the least notice of what they say; knowing by experience that they are quite as likely as not to say the exact opposite the next day. It is a great pity that an actress of Miss Lena Ashwell's ability should depart from the real vocation of the actress to indulge in the propaganda of the half-baked foolishness of the shrieking sisterhood and their mewling and puling male supporters. Miss Ashwell's talents are too valuable for the stage.

We have been proffered another apology. This time it is the Isis, which, in beautiful type, "greatly regrets that through inadvertence we printed last week in this column an inaccurate and misleading statement concerning The Academy." Such is life, and on the whole the thing is becoming monotonous. We have sufficient apologies in the office—printed, typewritten or holograph—to paper a wall. And we shall probably receive a great many more before we pay the debt of Nature. We should like to give notice to all whom it may concern, however, that we have abandoned the principle of turning the other cheek to malicious persons. For the angry spitfire libeller we shall for the future produce from the cupboard the legal stick, which would appear to be the sole instrument where-with he can be taught decent manners. And, in spite of his blubberings and splutterings and protestations that he will be a good boy for the future, we shall not spare him.

We have received a considerable number of letters from persons who approve or disapprove of our articles on "The Testament of John Davidson." In this matter we have as little use for the approval of our correspondents as for their disapproval; consequently, we are not publishing further letters on the subject. But if the individuals who belong to the disapproving faction will send us their names and addresses we shall be happy to print their letters. There is much virtue in "Constant Reader's" card; there is no virtue at all in anonymity when serious affairs are toward.

THE END OF THE DAY

THEN I, when all is dark, shall rise and go
From out the door's sweet shelter. All your love
Will loose about me. I shall leave behind
The warmth, the homeliness of the house, the deep Rich comfort of live sleep: and turn and bend
My way toward the voiceless deathfulness
Of night, the hill, the place that waits, the bed
That shall be made for me.

Upon that hour
I shall begin my journey when the night
Is nearly spent. And if you should awake,
You will not hear. And you shall never know
How great my fear was, or how many times
I wept, and paused upon the way and yearned
To you for succour, or how glad I was
To go; and yet, withal, how fain to stay.

I shall pass through the swinging doors alone
And step into the night. The garden flowers
Will all be folded; nor the singing birds
I passionately loved will pipe for me
When I step out. They shall not know my feet
Are gone without an echo and can have
No glad returning; I shall wend my way
And none shall hear; and tho' the dusky air
Grow sudden chill, I say they shall not know.

Death will be with me as I cross the moor
Upon his chilly arm my warmth shall lean
And learn to grow a-cold. I shall find out
What way one walks with Death. O, mystic Death,
I shall find out what way one walks with you!

Haply my heart may learn to love the way:
As, 'neath the snow, the earth grows young again,
Blossoms and buds, and waits upon the Spring,
So, near Death's coldness, may my heart regain
Its youth, and wait the springtide. In the grave
I shall be buried like a flower—dumb soul—
Bud—seed—within me, will you wake again
And blossom from my earth?

I shall not turn or look back on the house
With all its quaint-hued windows. When I called
You were so quick to hear and answer me,
It well might happen you would wake to greet
That backward glance. I shall not turn again.
The little house was sunlit: shall I waste
My last look on its shade? My steadfast eyes
I shall direct toward the distant hill,
And that way lend my feet. Haply the brook
Where once we wandered gladly, you and I—
Summer and all its airs encircling us—
May steal the whisper of my steps, and when
The happy days are circled round again
Utter good-bye for me. Then you shall know
How very fain I was awhile to go,
And yet, withal, how fain I was to stay.

There is a little churchyard on the hill
Where one may slumber soundly. Once I scorned
A resting-place so low: that was a day
Of leaping life and love. Now, in the dark,
I shall creep in so softly, nor the wind,
Nor one slight sod once fleetly scorned, shall know
That I have found out my bed.

And when at last
I am a-soundly sleeping, and my love
And joy and pain in all are all forgot,
Your feet may come that way. You will find out Where I have placed my pillow. You will see How fair the churchyard is upon the hill,
How gentle is my sleep. And when your tears
Are all run o'er and finished, you shall know
At last—not sadly—tho' I longed to stay,
How good a thing it was that I should go.

"SAVAGE AND TARTARLY"

THE centenary of the Quarterly Review, as is the way with centenaries, has called forth a fair measure of lollipop writing on the part of journals which profess an admiration for the "great house of Murray." All sorts of anonymous and cheerful people have held up pious hands and lifted up pious voices on the subject, and one might imagine from the general tone of awe and eager respect that the Quarterly Review of our own day was notoriously a vigorous organ of literary and political opinion. Mr. Murray's centenary number is dated April, and at the back of it there is an article of fifty pages devoted to an account of the origin and early history of the Quarterly, which article we are told is "to be continued." And the article is interleaved with portraits of John Murray the Second, William Gifford, Robert Southey, "the Rt. Hon. John Wilson Croker," and other celebrities. We hope that the letterpress itself is not the actual handiwork of the present editor of the Quarterly. In any case it is an extraordinary effort, and while it has been generally praised, we shall venture to assert that the literary world could have done very well without it, and that it exhibits qualities which are not over-desirable when a journal happens to be giving space to a consideration of itself. In other words, the writer, whoever he may be, is a singularly faithful friend of the house of Murray, and of all persons who at any time have been associated with the Quarterly Review. Our friend, for we believe that for a consideration he will be just as friendly to us as he is to the Quarterly, looks at life steadily and sees it whole; but he does it always with the assistance of the spectacles of Albemarle Street. It is, of course, common knowledge that Robert Southey was once a contributor to the Quarterly Review. The gentleman with the Albemarle Street spectacles describes him as follows:

Next on our list of early collaborators comes Robert Southey, perhaps the most industrious and prolific man of letters that England has produced. At the time of which we are speaking he was living at Keswick, the friend and neighbour of Wordsworth, then settled at Grasmere. Literature was his means of livelihood; and the "many mouths" which (as he said) he had to "feed out of one inkstand" imposed upon him a life of laborious toil, which, however, his courage and energy, and the high ideal of literary work which he always kept before him, prevented from sinking into a mere drudgery. As he wrote to his benefactor, Mr. Wynne, "A healthy body, an active mind, and a cheerful heart, are the three best boons Nature can bestow; and God be praised, no man ever enjoyed these more perfectly." Though only thirty-five, he was widely known as a copious and fairly successful writer. Two volumes of "Minor Poems," "Thalaba," "Madoc," some translations from the Spanish, and several other works had already appeared. "The Curse of Kehama" was to come out in the following year. Like Canning, he had begun life as a Whig, he had even been a Republican, but he was now a Tory of the Tories, and was sorely vexed when his revolutionary drama, "Wat Tyler," a work of his youth, was published without his knowledge in 1817.

And we are told further that Southey wrote "close on" a hundred articles for the Review, for which he was well paid; that his receipts from the Quarterly were his chief source of income; that Gifford had a very high opinion of his prose, and that Dr. Garnet considered him in the light of a practical statesman, who was ahead of public opinion. Of course, we cannot expect the Quarterly of the moment to offer us any real estimate of Southey. In the view of the Quarterly the fact that he contributed to the Quarterly makes him a "man of distinction," and the fact that he is almost as dead as Croker and Queen Anne, and was of little more account than either, must, of course, not be allowed to obtrude itself into the Quarterly's kindly and reverent appreciation. We are inclined for our own part to believe that Southey's thirty years' intimate association with the Quarterly Review proves, if it prove anything at all, that for thirty years at any rate the Quarterly was in a pretty bad way, and was not by any means the great and brilliant organ which the devotees of the house of Murray would fain conjure up for us. Right through the article before us all sorts of useless and undistinguished persons are trotted out as men of parts and genius, simply because they happen to have written something for the Quarterly. The names of quite two-thirds of them are entirely forgotten, and the works of the other third, with the single exception of those of Scott, are works which nobody reads, and which have little or no merit, whether literary or otherwise. Nobody in his senses can doubt that the Quarterly of this period was just as ordinary and just as humdrum as the Quarterly of our own beautiful time, not to say just as stupid and just as far removed from the real issues of literature and government. The writer of Mr. Murray's appreciative article cannot be content to leave with his redoubtable journal even the small reputation for brutality which it managed to achieve by dint of its attack on Keats, and of its treatment of the early work of Tennyson. Mr. Murray's young man actually defends the Quarterly's Keats article. "It should be noted," he says, "that the review is limited to the 'Endymion,' which by common consent, contains more of Keats' defects and eccentricities, and less of his essential beauties, than any other of his considerable works." Common consent is rich, inasmuch as it no doubt means the common consent of the writer of the article and Mr. John Murray, with, perhaps, that eminent poet, the President of Magdalen, thrown in. And, in any case, defects and eccentricities, or no defects and eccentricities, there is more poetry in any given hundred lines of "Endymion" than "the most industrious and prolific man of letters that England has produced," with all the editors and contributors of the Quarterly to help him, ever wrote in their lives. The Ode to Pan alone was unthinkable beyond the range of any of them; and that anybody should attempt to excuse or to obtain credit for the Quarterly Review out of its Keats' article in the year of grace 1909 is at once amazing and scandalous. Of its treatment of Tennyson the Quarterly very naturally desires to plume itself because it really desires to plume itself on everything that has ever happened to it. Let us hearken, and smile:

It is only fair to acknowledge that many—in fact, most—of the critic's objections were justified by the most convincing of tests—that the poet either dropped or altered the incriminated verses. For instance, in "The Lady of Shalott" the half-stanza:

From the bank, and from the river
He flashed into the crystal mirror—
"Tirra lirra, tirra lirra" (lirrar?),
Sang Sir Lancelot,

becomes in the later edition:

From the bank, and from the river
He flashed into the crystal mirror—
"Tirra lirra," by the river
Sang Sir Lancelot.

Again, for the half-stanza (as originally written):

Knight and burgher, lord and dame,
To the planked wharfage came;
Below the stern they read her name,
The Lady of Shalott,

we have in the version of 1842:

Out upon the wharfs they came,
Knight and burgher, lord and dame,
And round the prow they read her name,
The Lady of Shalott.

In "The Miller's Daughter" the stanzas with which the critic found fault were almost all either omitted or rewritten. The same is the case with several lines in "Enone." A passage in "The Lotuseaters" (spelt thus originally) contained the line "Like a dreamy Lotuseater—a delicious Lotuseater," disappeared in the later poem, as did also a stanza in "The Palace of Art":

Isaiah, with fierce Ezekiel,
Swarth Moses by the Coptic Sea,
Plato, Petrarca, Livy and Raphael,
And eastern Confutzee—

a stanza which to the humorous sense of the critic recalled the lines in "that celebrated Doric idyll," "The Groves of Blarney":

Statues growing that noble place in,
All heathen goddesses most rare,
Homer, Plutarch, and Nebuchadnezzar,
All standing naked in the open air!

But perhaps the most remarkable instance of an improvement due to criticism of the Quarterly is to be found in "A Dream of Fair Women," in which originally a stanza ran thus:

The tall masts quivered as they lay afloat;
The temples, and the people, and the shore;
One drew a sharp knife through my tender throat
Slowly—and nothing more.

On this the critic observes: "What touching simplicity! what pathetic resignation! He cut my throat—nothing more. One might, indeed, ask what more she would have?" Tennyson took the hint, showing herein real greatness;

All of which is truly marvellous and indicates quite clearly that what the Quarterly has not done for the enlargement and embellishment of English letters in general and English poetry in particular still remains to be done. Tennyson took the Quarterly's hint, "showing herein"—for once in his otherwise dull and squalid career—"real greatness." Let the Quarterly take a hint from us. Let it remember that self-congratulation is no part of the business of an honest journal, and that history written from the point of view of the congratulator is always very indifferent history. As we have said, the Quarterly's estimate of itself is "to be continued." We shall make no demur. But why, in the name of "The Rt. Hon. John Wilson Croker," should it be framed and couched in the manner we have indicated? The Quarterly has nothing to lose by frank avowals about its past, and equally it has nothing to gain by salting the particulars with pretty hints as to its own infallibility and its own importance. The rule for people who are lucky enough to attain centenaries is to let other people celebrate them. The Quarterly's article would have come ill, excepting in the way of sheer and unblushing compliment, from the Nineteenth Century or from the Fortnightly Review; but appearing as it does in the Quarterly itself it smells to heaven of bumptiousness, snobbishness and unhumorousness. The persons responsible for it must have scorned delights and lived laborious evenings to get it right. One cannot doubt that it is an article which has been cut and hacked and altered and "redone-up," as it were, out of all reason. To get a statement of the facts, which, while being a statement difficult on the whole to controvert is blended with a nice portrayal of the excellence and power and benevolence and wisdom and lordly munificence and vast circulation of the Quarterly, must have been a great strain on the energies of the parties concerned. But they have managed to achieve what less painstaking people might have considered impossible.

BURLINGTON HOUSE

THIRD AND FINAL NOTICE.

If the Water-colour Room may fairly be taken as a criterion, the most important point which strikes the observer is the lamentable decay of the English School of Water-colour Painting. Though Burlington House is not, perhaps, ordinarily the place where the state of that art can be judged best, unfortunately the present exhibition emphasises only too pointedly the impression already produced elsewhere. A second characteristic of the collection naturally arising out of the first is the large proportion of drawings actually made in water-colour for no other reason than the artists' caprice or limitations in the use of media. A third characteristic is the high proportion of comparatively good work in water-colour done by women artists. There is no intrinsic reason why the majority of the larger drawings especially, should not have been produced as oil pictures. Among such works are Mr. Henshall's "The Foundling" (845); Mr. Tucker's "Shades of Autumn (858); Mr. Garside's "In Anglesey" (861); with two small drawings, Miss Canziani's "Lago Maggiore" (866) and Miss Kell's much too direct imitation of Burne-Jones's "Thanksgiving" (846). In fact, those most susceptible to improvement, Mr. Garside's and Miss Canziani's drawings, which show considerable merit, would have been better if painted in oil. Mr. Charles Dixon's "The Embarkation of Henry the Eighth at Dover" (771), though deserving praise for its painstaking elaboration, could scarcely be successful in either medium. It is this ignorance of the possibilities and limitations of water-colour which marks its decay. However, there are exceptions to the prevailing tendency. Sir Harry Johnston, who will be regarded by professional artists as an "amateur," has produced a very pleasing and quite remarkable water-colour, "Awaiting an Audience" (854). A certain preraaphaelism in treatment makes it reminiscent of the work of Mr. Holman Hunt, but it has its peculiar merit. Sir Harry Johnston shows himself an artist unconcerned with side issues. He offers no arguments in paint in favour of his superiority over rivals, and expounds no moralities. He works with a single eye to his own perfection. This has done more than prevent him from missing the beauty of his subject: it has enabled him to seize and interpret beauty which is not obvious. The local colour is, therefore, more sincerely expressed in his little drawing of West African life than in yards of Mr. Hunt's elaborate canvases having for their object the realisation of Palestinian life, with ulterior motives. In his treatment of an exotic atmosphere Mr. Phrené Spiers also is successful, in his small drawing, "The Temple of Maharraker" (844) he produces with clear washes of colour the flood of clear light which offers so much difficulty to English artists. In reflected light Mr. Storey's study, "A Spanish Interior, Toledo" (901), though attractive at first sight, does not bear more careful examination. Mr. North's clever contrivances in his little drawing, "Snow" (921), almost beguile the eye into a belief in the truth of his rimeladen atmosphere on a frosty day in snow-time. Mr. William Brock's "Harvest Moon" (778) produces a pleasing and generally true evening effect, but he exaggerates the convention by which he seeks to emphasise the tone; the colours of his two figures in the middle distance are so bright that they strike the eye as false, and betray the convention. Mr. Flint's "A Damsel who made her Captor love her" (795), in spite of faults of design betraying lack of taste and producing inconsistency, is a fairly successful example of bold water-colour treatment on a small scale. Mr. Stanger Pritchard's "Bargain Hunters, Bruges" (833) is a better example, for it shows good taste and more individuality. Mr. East's large drawing, "Amer-sham" (769), is true water-colour, but he has subordinated his individuality too much to combined reminiscences of Cotman and Constable, and his drawing lacks character. Mr. Anton van Anrooy is a clever aquerellist of figures; his portrait, "Miss Rachael Keith" (786), is an attractive and harmonious drawing in grey tones, if a trifle too watery; his study, "The Lacemaker" (973), is less attractive, but shows even more ability. Though Mr. Stannus misunderstands the uses of water-colour, he deserves praise for his sense of a "swell" at sea in his "Good West Wind" (879). Mr. Moony's "The Lady and the Poet" (811) must be noticed for the sake of a sort of derived originality, and for its bizarre effectiveness. He has evidently been brought up on Mr. Walter Crane's charming toy-books, and has used their decorative qualities pictorially in a manner of his own. The well merited acceptance of his drawing is another sign of Academical expansion. Of Mr. Brockbank's "Cleevé Prior Mill" (777) little can be said, except that it is a water-colour drawing without offence. These drawings fairly exhaust the list of male successes, such as they may severally be conceded to be. Among drawings by women the following should be noticed as the best examples: Miss Hagarty's "Entrance to Poole Harbour" (883) has many of the qualities of the best school of water-colour painting; it does not reach that standard on account of a failure of unity of tone. It is a pity, also, that Miss Hagarty should introduce a rainbow, for it is an enchantment to painters which leads to a fall. Mrs. Knight's "Cheyne Walk" (828) is a very well toned study of London slush, so realistic as to make the spectator shiver, but it should have been painted in oils—indeed, Mrs. Knight has used her water-colours so that at a hasty glance they produce the effect of oils. Miss Gow's large figure subject, "The Torn Dress" (831), is as good an example of the use of water-colours in clear whitish tones as is to be found in the room. Though a pleasing composition, it cannot be said to show much character. Miss Sawyer's "The Sea hath its Pearls" (837) must be noticed for the artist's good drawing, her harmonious treatment of clear and vivid greens and the quiet humour with which she uses the familiar design of Andromeda for her pretty mermaid reclining on a monstrous marine pet. Finally, attention should be drawn to Miss Nixon's tiny drawing, "Market Day, Etaples" (815), for she shows a distinct power in grouping figures and a vigorous talent for bold treatment, suggesting a profitable study of Wilhelm Maris.

It is too well recognised that the art of miniature painting is dead, for some two hundred and forty reduced portraits catalogued as "Miniatures" to require individual criticism. It must be affirmed, with regret, that, with two exceptions, Miss Laidman's "Ernest Brassington" (982) and Mrs. Cook's "John Francis Barnett" (1069), of which the merits are not very high nor those of real miniatures, these small portraits have no merits of any kind. They have less claim to be regarded as objects of art than daguerotypes, for they have none of the "style" which is to be found in many of those productions. Fortunately the hospitality of the Burlington Fine Arts Club enables anyone really interested in seeing what the art of miniature painting was capable of, opportunity for doing so at the present moment. It is to be hoped that the artists who spend time, patience and eyesight on these popular souvenirs will obtain invitations to visit the club's exhibition, and may be fired with a desire to revive the art. They will realise that their sublimated photography is descended, though sinisterly enough, from the art which produced Holbein's "Mrs. Pemberton" and attained heights which Burlington House cannot now reach in all its rooms.

To judge from the Black and White Room it would seem as if the art of engraving were not only affected, as it undoubtedly is, by cheap processes of reproduction, but seriously threatened. There are, of course, many skilled engravers still amongst us, but the Academy has attracted very few of them this year to Burlington House, and the collection is a singularly dull one. There is no English artist in full practice more experienced in all forms of engraving than Mr. Strang, but he does not appear at his best in his two portraits, "Sir Charles Holroyd" (1235) and "Portrait of a Gentleman" (1257). His "Eastern Woman" (1354) is remarkable for its decorative quality and its peculiar material, apparently consisting of a thin plaster laid on canvas, and in this respect resembling one of Blake's many "fresco" attempts. Among the other more interesting productions, notice is due to Miss Annie Williams's "From a Twelfth Storey, New York" (1300); Mr. Smart's map-like "Château Gaillard" (1315); Mr. Exley's "Place d'Armes, Caudebec" (1250); Mr. Gaskell's two mezzotints, "Corfe Castle" (1252) and "St. Albans" (1289); and for its good sunlight effect, to Miss Spilhaus's "Worship to Allah" (1322).

The Architectural drawings form at the present time the most important section of the exhibition. Owing partly to the termination of leases, partly to the faulty construction of late Georgian buildings, and partly to the real or supposed exigencies of modern life, there has never been a period of such general reconstruction everywhere, since the rebuilding of London after the great fire. Nevertheless, the Architectural Room is the only really unpopular one in Burlington House. It is visited by the general public with evident repugnance, and only when some acquaintance is exhibiting, or when the design for some new building in a familiar locality is exhibited. The public runs through its task as quickly as possible, and leaves with the vaguest idea of what the projected buildings will be like. This is not surprising, for the connections between plans and buildings is difficult to understand. To express on paper a conception formed in building materials, or to evolve by calculations, plans and pictures an object which will become a useful and beautiful edifice, has always been a rare gift, even among architects. Large numbers of the most beautiful buildings in the world are but amalgams of accretions to which the essentially practical character of the art of architecture has given an artificial nature. They are not the embodiment of a single idea which has ever been set down on paper at one time. To the critic, too, in whom some faculty for transforming plans into buildings must be assumed, the Architectural Room is becoming more and more fatiguing, owing to the tendency to aim at pictorial effect in architectural designs. Among those exhibited this year are many which might take quite a respectable place in the Water-colour Room. Mr. Belcher, the recently-elected Academician, employs a draughtsman for his designs for Lew House (1436) and Talmore Place (1440), with quite a pretty taste for bird's-eye landscape. Mr. Dawber's draughtsman represents his design for Tuesley Court (1429) as a purer landscape, and Mr. Mitchell's draughtsman of his "House at Avon Dassett" should win a local prize for landscape painting, where finish is a requirement. Mr. Mawson's design for a "Garden at Lees Court" (1460) takes an even more prophetic form. This very ingenious example of garden mapping is represented as it cannot possibly appear until some fifteen years after the drawing, when the yew hedges, which are its most striking feature, have had time to grow. Close to these pictures Mr. Haywood's "Competition Design for London County Hall" (1497) unfolds its long utilitarianism, unadorned. No doubt these attractive representations are useful in interpreting architects' conceptions to their clients, and still more in concealing details which their less cultivated taste is likely to revolt from, but they increase the fatigues of criticism, for the critic has to be continually correcting his judgment to different standards of interpretation. Criticism at least would be much facilitated if the landscape designs could be grouped together. Among many designs for public buildings of a strictly utilitarian nature, which need not be specified, since they appear to be still under consideration, Mr. A. Gilbert Scott exhibits his "Design for Glamorgan County Hall" (1525), which it is to be hoped, for the taste of that county, has already been accepted unanimously. It is a dignified, well-proportioned and strongly characterised design, giving evidence of considerable creative power; it has also every sign of being well adapted for its purpose. In this country, always singularly barren of fine municipal buildings, it will be a rare example. The building should stand isolated, for in so far as it is open to criticism, it is of too foreign a character to accord with English architecture if placed in close proximity. Conversely, in the adaptation of western uses to exotic conditions—that is to say, of buildings for western purposes in foreign countries—the collection gives several examples, which show very great advance beyond the gingerbread structures which have misrepresented western architecture in India and the nearer East—namely, Mr. Schultz's simple cruciform church, "Cathedral, Khartoum" (1610); Mr. Jaggard's "Church near Capetown" (1606); and, in a less degree, Messrs. Kelly and Dickie's "Mission Hospital at Hebron" (1501). Mr. Pite's "English Mission Church, Safed, Galilee" (1558), is too amorphous to commend itself without more intimate knowledge of the local requirements. Among somewhat stereotyped imitations of Gothic, having an agreeable effect, are Mr. Hare's "University College of North Wales" (1372); and Messrs. Oliver, Leeson and Wood's "Queen Elizabeth's Grammar School, Hexham" (1390), a more idiosyncratic design, gaining much by its position on a broad terrace approached by particularly well-proportioned, shallow, semi-circular steps. Of a similar type, for ecclesiastical purposes, are Mr. Tapper's "Chapel for the Community of the Resurrection" (1567); Mr. Prynn's "St. Wilfrid's Church, Bognor" (1582); and, as additions, Messrs. Gibbons and Son's "New Chancel to St. Chad's Church," Far Headingley (1588); and Mr. Cecil Hare's "New Chancel, St. Stephen's Church, Sninton" (1561). Mr. Walters makes a common mistake in the exterior of his important designs for "Buckfast Abbey Church" (1615 and 1616) by making the caps of his Norman turrets too steep. This is an apparently small detail with which restorers disfigure much original Norman work. Among other faults in detail which strike the eye, are the brick pillars which terminate a low garden wall in Mr. Dawber's "Rebuilding of Nether Swell Manor" (1467), which are much too high; Mr. Lutyen's meaningless brackets below sunk oval windows in his "Garden View of a House at Ilkley" (1411); and Mr. Bidlake's disproportionate chimneys in his "The Knoll, Leicester" (1424 and 1447). In these four cases the faults here mentioned are easily removable blots in otherwise more or less successful designs. Messrs. Silcock and Reay deal cleverly and with good effect, in their "Cornwall County Council Offices" (1491), with the difficulty of a long building situated on a considerable slope. Mr. Maurice Webb has devised an effective way of enclosing a staircase from a hall below, and at the same time lighting both with the same lamps, in his "New Staircase, Brockhurst" (1477). Mr. T. G. Jackson is as accomplished as usual in his "Electrical Laboratory" (1379), on his particular field, Oxford; though he somewhat overloads the porch. Of two designs especially, Mr. Arnold Mitchell's "Chapel at Berndorf" (1570), which he seems to destine as a target for Herr Krupp; and Mr. Hemy's "Design for a Church at Ascot" (1593), little can be said, save that their ideas of proportion are certainly not common. It is a pity that an architect with time for development, of whom much is to be expected, Mr. Greenslade, is only represented by one design, "Collegiate Buildings" (1537), on so very small a scale as to give but a hazardous hint at a finely-proportioned and grandiose mass of buildings. The designs for decoration are mainly for stained glass, and do not show much of the taste which distinguished the late Mr. Kempe's, or of the originality to be found in Mr. Christopher Whall's. The most noteworthy exceptions are Mr. Walter Camm's "Elijah fed by Ravens" (1605) and Miss Camm's "Lucian's Vision of St. Gamaliel" (1612). Mr. Prynn shows an interesting detail in his interior (1582), already mentioned, a hanging Calvary in which figures of the Virgin and St. John accompany the Crucifix. This arrangement is unusual, and Mr. Prynn's design recalls too closely the form of a pendant for the neck.

A final return must be made to the oil-paintings for the sake of two canvases of very different orders and degrees of merit, Mr. Sims's "The Night Piece to Julia," omitted deliberately, and Mrs. Walter Nutt's "Malay Children, Singapore," omitted by mistake. An instinctive distaste for the shade of blue so conspicuous in the robe of Mr. Sims's Julia drove the critic from the closer examination which his picture deserved. That examination has now been made and reveals many fine passages of colour and design, with much fantastic charm, especially in the attendant children, the rabbits and the white peacock, and a quality of painting rare in many pictures more immediately attractive. Mrs. Nutt's picture requires notice on account of its position, and deserves it for its evident veracity, for the modelled solidity of the brown figures, and for the agreeable treatment of the meadow, half in shade and half in sunlight, bounded by the river with its red-sailed boats.

THE SENSE OF HUMOUR

THAT most precious possession, a sense of humour, is in one aspect the power of so viewing the inconsistencies, incongruities and contrarieties of life that one is moved by them to laughter instead of tears. It is a natural gift, and one is with it or without it, as the Fates have decreed at one's birth. Humour is distinct from wit in being a less intellectual quality and implying less brilliancy and imaginative power; it is true that a person cannot be said to be witty unless he has a sense of humour, but the word "wit" originally signified "wisdom," and it still, strictly speaking, denotes more power over words and images; humour being far more unconscious and unstudied. That is, a person may be humorous—namely, pleasant, jocular, lively, amusing—without being in any marked degree witty, which implies a higher mental power; but it is impossible to write of humour without encroaching on the province of wit, and they are, in fact, in the vocabularies of many, entirely synonymous.

"A quick conception and an easy delivery," Pope says of wit—you might define a humorous saying so. But, then, take Pope again:

True wit is nature to advantage drest,
What oft was thought, but n'er so well exprest.

There you have a distinction.

"Wit," we are told by another, "relates to the matter, humour to the manner; that our old comedies abounded with wit, and our old actors with humour." No doubt; but it is often more than this, surely. For what would become of any originality in our sense of humour if it is only the faculty with which we appreciate other people's wit? It is true that the delightful humour of an Irishman is frequently due to the limitation rather than to the profundity of his intellect; he has a latent sense of humour natural to him, a sense of fun and irresponsible gaiety of heart, and he often stumbles on his bon-mots by accident, as who should say that the worst thing about the influenza is that you are ill of it for such a long time after you get well. But English "bulls" have often longer horns than the Hibernian; thus a London daily paper lately advised Liberals "to rally round each other."

Perhaps the truth is that one can be humorous without being witty, but not witty without possessing a sense of humour. There are also many instances when people do not wish to be, or know that they are, humorous, but are nevertheless "the cause that wit is in other men," as Falstaff has it. Robert Montgomery was not primarily a comic poet, but he becomes sheerly comic when Macaulay writes of him. Humour is, however, entirely a matter of individual taste, and it differs in every class and in every age and generation. Is "Pickwick" still the ideal jest book, the most mirth-provoking story we know? Only, perhaps, to those people who are over sixty years of age.

A truly witty man, provided that he is also kindly, is everywhere a most delightful and stimulating companion, but the humorist may be very far from being so—may, indeed, be a terror or a bore instead of a delight, according as one's taste in humour does or does not happen to coincide with his own. The humorist who is always ready with the sickliest of puns, the clashing, not of any appositeness in the sense, but merely of a jingle in the sound of words, or he who claims as much admiration for a so-called "poem" written in the shape of a jug or with one letter of the alphabet absent throughout, as for the divinest lyric, is almost as trying as the boy who roars with laughter at the sight of an old man slipping over a piece of orange-peel.

The present writer remembers hearing or reading some years ago—the subject under discussion being the difference between a masculine and feminine sense of humour—that there was something so irresistibly funny to a man in any anecdotes concerning whisky or a mother-in-law that the mere sound of the words would make him laugh. This seemed an incredible statement, but after careful observation it is impossible to resist coming to the conclusion that this type of man does exist, and that if you say to one of them: "Now I'll tell you a story about a whisky-bottle or a mother-in-law," his face will instantly wrinkle into expectant, appreciative smiles; and that this man is not always an illiterate or commonplace person is proved by the fact that in his Lectures to the Academy on Spanish Art the late Lord Leighton could quote, amid a tempest of laughter, the perhaps well-known apostrophe to a picture of St. Sebastian: "O Blessed Sebastian, pierced through with many arrows, would that thy soul was mine—would that thy body was my mother-in-law's!"

It may be interesting to consider and compare the opinions of the eminent on the general question. To take humour first, Carlyle says: "Humour has justly been regarded as the finest perfection of poetic genius; he who wants it, be his other gifts what they may, has only half a mind; an eye for what is above him, not for what is about him or below him." And again: "Humour is a sort of inverse sublimity, exalting, as it were, into our affections what is below us, while sublimity draws down into our affections what is above us." This definition, though it certainly does not cover the whole ground, explains one province of humour, and we can perhaps see a distinction here, where "wit" would not so well apply. Coleridge says: "Humour is consistent with pathos, while wit is not." To illustrate this statement one might quote Oliver Goldsmith's description of the poor author's bedroom:

The morn was cold, he views with keen desire
The rusty grate, unconscious of a fire;
With beer and milk arrears the frieze was scored,
And five cracked teacups dressed the chimney board;
A night-cap decked his brows instead of bay,
A cap by night—a stocking all the day!

But here, perhaps, the pathos predominates.

Dr. Isaac Barrow has a sentence that certainly does cover the ground sufficiently on wit, but it leaves one gasping and breathless. He says: "Sometimes it lieth in pat allusion to a known story, or in reasonable application of a trivial saying, or in forging an apposite tale; sometimes it playeth in words and phrases, taking advantage from the ambiguity of their sense or the affinity of their sound; sometimes it is wrapped up in a dress of humorous expression; sometimes it lurketh under an odd similitude; sometimes it is lodged in a sly question, in a smart answer, in a quirkish reason, in a shrewd intimation, in cunningly diverting or cleverly retorting an objection; sometimes it is couched in a bold scheme of speech, in a tart irony, in a lusty hyperbole, in a startling metaphor, in a plausible reconciling of contradictions, or in acute nonsense; sometimes a scenical representation of persons or things, a counterfeit speech, a mimical look or gesture, passeth for it; sometimes an affected simplicity, sometimes a presumptuous bluntness, giveth it being; sometimes it riseth only from a lucky hitting upon what is strange; sometimes from a crafty wrestling obvious matter to the purpose. Often it consisteth in one knows not what, and springeth up one can hardly tell how. Its ways are unaccountable and inexplicable, being answerable to the numberless roivings of fancy and windings of language."

There is not much left to be said as to what wit is, after that, one would fancy, except that it is singularly absent from this description of it; but is all this wit as distinct from humour? Certainly not; much of it is applicable to both; the learned divine is not here attempting a distinction, and it is scarcely surprising that people's ideas get a little mixed when the forms of both are so Protean. Addison, too, does not attempt to draw a distinction between wit and humour in his "Six Papers on Wit"; with him, too, the terms are more or less synonymous. He says of humour, in No. 616 of the Spectator: "True humour lies in the thought, and arises from the representation of images in odd circumstances and uncommon lights." And he gives in another place the genealogy of both true and false humour: False humour being descended from Falsehood, who was the mother of Nonsense, who had a son called Frenzy, who married one of the daughters of Folly, called Laughter, whose son was False Humour; while Truth, Good Sense, Wit and Mirth were the progenitors of True Humour.

Locke, too, might be quoted here. In the Second Book of his Essay on the Human Understanding, Chapter XI., he says: "And hence, perhaps, may be given some reason of that common observation, that men who have a great deal of wit and prompt memories have not always the clearest judgment or deepest reason. For wit lying most in the assemblage of ideas, and putting those together with quickness and variety, wherein can be found any resemblance or congruity, thereby to make up pleasant pictures and agreeable visions in the fancy: judgment, on the contrary, lies quite on the other side, in separating carefully, one from another, ideas wherein can be found the least difference, thereby to avoid being misled by similitude, and, by affinity, to take one thing for another. This is a way of proceeding quite contrary to metaphor and allusion, wherein, for the most part, lies that entertainment and pleasantry of wit, which strikes so lively on the fancy, and, therefore, is so acceptable to all people; because its beauty appears at first sight, and there is required no labour of thought to examine what truth or reason there is in it."

This is very intellectual and sounds a little ponderous; there is not much of Pope's "Quick conception and easy delivery" here!

But we may now turn from definitions and from the conversationally witty man to the writer who makes his appeal to a wider audience. It would be interesting to trace the history of the sense of humour as displayed by its most conspicuous possessors from the days of Plautus, Terence and Aristophanes, by way of Boccaccio, Chaucer, the Elizabethans, the wits of the Restoration, Molière, the Augustans, the early Victorians, down to our own day, and to note in what they differ and what they have in common. Undoubtedly each generation has its own peculiar taste in humour as in everything else, but there are some kinds of situations and characters and, above all, some manner of treating them impossible to define, which men everywhere find laughable. Cervantes, Butler, Dryden, Pope, Sterne, Addison, Steele, Sheridan, Goldsmith, Charles Lamb, Swift—whose laugh is somewhat harsh—Fielding, Sidney Smith, Dumas, Thackeray, Dickens, Praed, Calverley—what a recollection of wholesome laughter do not their very names suggest!

For even in this decadent age we are not without our kindly jesters who can make us laugh and forbid one to take life too seriously, whilst waiting for the brighter day, which some of us hope is beginning to dawn. The day of the pessimists is over and spent:

When two well-to-do English men or women laugh it is obvious that a misfortune has happened to a third. There is a question which has never yet been discussed—namely, Which has given the most pleasure to the world, fortune or misfortune? The founders of the "Calamity Club" are convinced that trouble kills time—provided it is the trouble of others, etc., etc.

It is wearying to read much of this kind of thing. True humour lies in the possession of an eye for the comedy in common things, and implies some latent dramatic power, some sense of form; yet the same thing will often appear deliciously funny to one person, whilst another will see in it nothing amusing at all; one might take an illustration from Charles Lamb, but we will rather turn to Borrow instead—Borrow, that most delightful of writers, to some people; to others not interesting at all. One quotation is taken from Mr. Lang's essay on Borrow:

"It is, I believe," he says, "the opinion of the best critics that The Bible in Spain is Borrow's masterpiece. It very likely is so. At the present moment I feel myself even more than usually disqualified for so grave a consideration, by my overpowering delight in its dear, deluding title. A quarter of a century ago, in all decent homes, a boy's reading was, by the stern decree of his elders, divided rigorously, though at the same time it must be admitted crudely, into Sunday books and week-day books. 'What have you got there?' has before now been an enquiry addressed on a Sunday afternoon to some youngster, suspiciously engrossed in a book. 'Oh, The Bible in Spain,' would be the reply. 'It is written by a Mr. Borrow, you know, and it is all about' (then the title page would come in useful) 'his attempts to circulate the Scriptures in the Peninsula.' 'Indeed! Sounds most suitable,' answers the gulled authority, some foolish sisters' governess or the like illiterate, and moves off. And then the happy boy would wriggle in his chair, and, as if thirsting to taste the first fruits of his wife, hastily seek out a streaky page, and there read, for perhaps the hundredth time, the memorable words: "'Good are the horses of the Moslems,'" said my old friend; "where will you find such? They descend rocky mountains at full speed, and neither trip nor fall, but you must be cautious with the horses of the Moslems, and treat them with kindness, for the horses of the Moslems are proud and they like not being slaves. When they are young and first mounted, jerk not their mouths with your bit, for be sure if you do they will kill you; sooner or later you will perish beneath their feet. Good are our horses, and good our riders. Yea, very good are the Moslems at mounting the horse; who are like them? I once saw a Frank rider compete with a Moslem on this beach, and at first the Frank rider had it all his own way and he passed the Moslem, but the course was long, very long, and the horse of the Frank rider, which was a Frank horse also, panted; but the horse of the Moslem panted not, for he was a Moslem also—and the Moslem rider at last gave a cry, and the horse sprang forward and he overtook the Frank horse, and then the Moslem rider stood up in his saddle. How did he stand? Truly he stood on his head, and these eyes saw him; he stood on his head in the saddle as he passed the Frank rider; and he cried 'Ha! ha!' as he passed the Frank breed, and the Frank lost by a far distance. Good are the Franks, good their horses; but better are the Moslems, and better the horses of the Moslems." That boy, as he lay curled up in his chair, dozing over the enchanted page, knew full well, else had he been no Christian boy, that it was not a Sunday book which was making his eyes start out of his head; yet, reckless, he cried 'Ha! ha!' and read on, and as he read he blessed the madcap Borrow for having called his romance by the sober-sounding, propitiatory title of The Bible in Spain."

Borrow is a most delightful example of unsought humour; he certainly had not studied Isaac Barrow, Locke, or Addison's "Six Papers on Wit"; his books are only so much the more enchanting! For whatever wit in some of its many varied forms may do, humour, at any rate, cannot exist without this delightful frolicsomeness and lightness of spirits.

A sense of humour, then, is not necessarily an intellectual possession, it is rather a natural faculty apart, a happy disposition or way of viewing life with a gay and light heart. It is coloured by the tastes, the character, the other various gifts of the individual; if he is intellectual his humour often becomes wit, and his sayings and writings may or may not be delightful, according as they are to each person happily or unhappily tinged by his character and opinions. Like Autolycus in the "Winter's Tale," the humorist might sing:

Jog on, jog on, the footpath way,
And merrily hent the stile-a;
A merry heart goes all the way,
A sad one tires in a mile-a.

That is the great secret: to have a light and merry heart, the disposition that looks always on the bright side, "and loves to sit i' the sun," and can teach others to do so too. What do we not owe to the man who can make us laugh, not bitter, misanthropic laughter, but the actual forgetting of our petty cares, worries and disappointments for a time in a sense of genuine amusement. The man who can make good-tempered laughter resound wherever either he or his book goes is a benefactor to his race indeed!

MEN OF NOTE

Six Oxford Thinkers. By ALGERNON CECIL, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. (Murray, 7s. 6d. net.)

HE who attempts the ambitious task of presenting the essential points of a great man's life in a few pages of print, of condensing vapours of diverse criticism into an easily appreciated form, should have a full knowledge of matters and men bearing upon his subject, an ease of literary craft, and a strongly developed faculty of judgment. These qualifications Mr. Algernon Cecil possesses, and in this well-conceived and—for its size—comprehensive volume he has exemplified them in a very pleasant manner. Where so much has been already written about men of fame, such as Newman, Froude, and Pater, it is not lightly that a critic can undertake to write more, and although, naturally enough, a great deal of Mr. Cecil's book consists of quotations and reproductions of previous essays by other authors, his own comments are by no means insignificant and are nearly always judicious and penetrating.

We like best the studies of Walter Pater, James Anthony Froude, and Edward Gibbon. Froude, perhaps, has taken in the world of literature a place more important than he deserves; his inaccuracies drew him into disproportionate prominence, and his style, however beautiful, is not particularly original; the originality lay in the application of it to the dry bones of history, and in that process he is unequalled. "Froude," says the author, "made himself the proprietor of a great tract of English history, and of that possession no man may rob him. Historians may dispute his title-deeds, harry his land, and remove his landmarks, but as long as men are men, agitated by human passion and ennobled by human achievement, so long will they prefer to hear the story of the Tudor epoch from his voice." Mr. Cecil acutely points out that the historians of the ancient world "had one advantage which their successors have not continued to enjoy":

Their narrative and selection of events passed for the most part uncriticised and uncontradicted in their own age, and lapse of time has rendered criticism and contradiction ineffectual, if not impossible. We may disbelieve their miracles and challenge their conclusions, but there will be no Spartan story of the Peloponnesian war, nor will Tiberius and Nero escape from the clutches of Tacitus. It is a great thing to have had the field to yourself.

The author does not give himself particular pains either to justify Froude or to condemn him, but aims rather at setting forth both sides of the controversy briefly and allowing the reader to form his own opinion. Too much has been written and talked about Froude and his vagaries, but the clearness of this little essay is admirable, and, although it cannot be rated as important or even striking, as a summary of Froude's life, faith and work it will give most readers considerable pleasure.

The short chapter on Walter Pater is more scholarly, more in the nature of definite criticism, and it is here, we think, that the author has hit the mark precisely. Pater is a difficult person to write about at any time, which is, perhaps, why he has inspired one or two astonishing people to light little memorial candles at which his own white radiance must shine down in pity. Not one critic in ten has any sympathy with Pater's standpoint—after making which assertion we would remark that it is quite possible to have that sympathy and yet not agree with him. His work was too compact of gems and gold, too smooth to make an appeal beyond a small circle that is probably not enlarging to any great extent; it lacked the hearty, salutary roughness of humanity; but in spite of this his name will live in English literature. On the subject of his style Mr. Cecil is distinctly good:

Facts with him are so little solid accretions possessed of the primary qualities, are so completely absorbed into the ideas of the writer, that at the end of each passage a man feels as he does at the end of a piece of music, unable to give an account of what has delighted him. And thus Pater's writing does in a great measure realise his conception of high art—the condition of music. And it is because he is thus determinedly metaphysical, because his reason is resolutely enthroned above the stream of consciousness, that his sympathy is so immobile and his style possesses that endless languor, which, as he might have said himself, is like the slow movement of a summer stream when the skies are dark and louring overhead, and the air heavy with a thousand scents. All things are turned to a solemn suspense, and appear lazily expectant; only the water-flies skip playfully and make little ripples on the surface of the water. But the thunder never breaks, and the delicious drowsy afternoon never dies.

His literary career was curious, and the progress of his thought was exceptional:

His mind built for him every kind of intellectual palace, led him through all the halls of fancy, decked with rare and costly ornament, showed him every choice and exquisite work that was done under the sun; and after this sore travail that God had given to the sons of men to be exercised therewith, brought him back at last, chastened and purified, to that same point from which, as a little child, he had started. Yet on those strange and silent seas of thought, where men fetch and carry so many argosies, he had been one of the most adventurous of voyagers and most skilful of merchantmen.

The opening chapter on Gibbon is almost as interesting and keenly put together. Not many men, it is to be imagined, can fix the day and the hour when their life's work was conceived, as could the great historian of Rome:

On the 15th October, 1764, as he sat musing amid the ruins of the Capitol, while the bare-footed friars were singing vespers in the Temple of Jupiter, he received the commission which, one may hope, comes to all men sooner or later. His life's work was found. "The idea," as he says, "of writing the decline and fall of the city started to my mind."

The majesty of the Roman Empire, and the pathos of its decay, exactly suited the cast of Gibbon's imagination, and he created a style capable of conveying his thoughts to his readers. Anyone can see that he was a consummate artist. It is the supreme excellence of his work that his manner precisely balances the weight of his subject; that all his conclusions are embalmed in choice and appropriate aromas. The Cæsars pass before our eyes in their long procession like the Sultans in the Rubâiyât, each bearing his load of splendour, so alluring in its appearance of immeasurable dominion and dazzling opportunity; yet the mind is never for an instant forgetful of that age-long fabric of Empire, a mere empty shell crumbling into ruin, yet still infinitely impressive in its power to strike terror into the wandering tribes of west and north by its name alone.

We have quoted sufficiently to show that Mr. Cecil is well equipped for his work of sketching for us these "Six Oxford Thinkers." The other three are J. H. Newman, "compared by Froude to Julius Cæsar," both physically and intellectually, R. W. Church, and Lord Morley—the latter, we confess, was rather a surprise. In one or two very minor points we disagree with the writer; for example, when he states that "Scotchmen possess something more than their proper share of the intellect of the age"; and we wish he would not use the words "awoken" and "desiderated." These, however, are of small import compared with the scheme of the book, and we conclude with the opinion that all students of literature in its best sense, and especially those who are interested in the influence of Oxford and its "Movement" on the thought of these men of the nineteenth century, should not neglect this terse and capable critique in the course of their reading.

SHORTER REVIEWS

A Modern Goddess. By GERTRUDE M. SAVERY. (Century Press, 6s.)

WE must allow this book a few lines, although it is difficult to say anything good about it. The author quite evidently appeals to an uncritical public—in fact, to a public which will have to be sublimely indifferent to the existence of fine work if it enjoys her book. The hero and heroine will be taken unquestionably to the heart of girls who absorb daily doses of the half-penny feuilletons, for in certain emergencies they ejaculate "God! was it a dream?" or "Don't kiss my mouth, for God's sake!" and similar glib inanities with a fervour which we can only stand and admire at a respectful distance. Inverted commas are exquisitely mismanaged on page after page; often it is impossible to tell who is speaking; the dialogue is insipid, without one redeeming touch of brilliance anywhere; the punctuation and composition we will illustrate by a short quotation:

She was tenderness itself as she went to Yvonne's side, "I don't know what the trouble was, childie, but you are too sunny, your nature too great to let it overcome your happiness, and although the sun may not ever seem so radiant, it will shine again for you, you were not meant to live in the shadows."

Cuth was sitting at the fire. . . . They were in their little house in the mountains. . . . Peggy. . . . It was odd how her thoughts were slipping away. . . . She clenched her teeth. The horrible pain was coming again. . . . It was worse this time. . . . Someone was coming in. . . . She waited. The pain was stifling. . . . And she was alone. . . . "Are you asleep, Yvonne?"

It was Dick's voice.

He crossed to the lounge hurriedly, something in the stillness alarmed him.

"Yvonne!"

His voice seemed to rouse her; she struggled up.

"I can't see. . . . I am going blind. . . . Cuth!"

"I am here, Yvonne," Dick said in a low voice. "For God's sake—"

With a faint moan she had fallen back in his arms dead.

We should like to suggest, having regard to the numberless rows of dots in this astonishing novel, that they are a poor substitute for ideas. It is a pity this badly-written story was ever allowed to reach the dignity of book-form. Has the candid friend disappeared for ever?

The Infamous John Friend. By MRS. R. S. GARNETT. (Duckworth, 6s.)

THIS history of the career of John Friend, a spy in the pay of Napoleon, and a man for whom conscience and honour were meaningless terms, is in every sense of the word a powerful one. The character of the determined hero is drawn with quite exceptional efficacy, and the single profound deep of goodness in his heart—his passionate love for his gentle wife—permeates the story from beginning to end, a relief from intrigues and scandals, and a proof that the most unscrupulous and discreditable beings may have compensating virtues which are unsuspected by the world outside. Susan Marny, a waif of the French Revolution (Suzanne de Marny), enters into the complicated web of affairs as the adopted child of the Friends. The opportunity of a visit to Brighton on their part gives the author an opening for a description of that town in the earlier years of the nineteenth century, of which she has availed herself splendidly; the place and its society, dissolute and uproarious, live before the reader in pages which for picturesqueness of detail are admirably written. Susan—her Anglicised name is retained—is adored by the young "bloods" of the drawing-rooms, makes some questionable acquaintances and suffers some troublous experiences; she falls in love at first sight, however, with Will North, a youth of low degree socially, but of generous nature and fairly sharp brains, and the fashioning of the love of these two forms a strand of additional interest in the narrative. Susan is rather too innocent for plausibility; towards the end of the book there is an instance of her simplicity which seems frankly incredible; but for all that she is a brave little maiden and a worthy recipient of the reader's homage. The trial of Friend for high treason is very finely pictured. The story closes with a horribly realistic account of his death by hanging, and in this respect we think that Mrs. Garnett has committed an error in taste; it would have been better to end on a note not quite so gloomy—with the reconciliation of North and his young wife, for example, which occurs just before. However, the whole book is strong and written with conspicuous ability, and readers who do not appreciate it will be difficult to please.

Much Ado About Something. By C. E. LAWRENCE. (Murray, 6s.)

WE might term this book an Iliad of the Fairies. It does not pretend to be true, does not even pretend to be possible, but it is none the less charming, and the author understands how to deal delicately with so light-winged and ethereal a subject. The whole plot concerns the proceedings of June, a good fairy, who comes to London bent on reforming the evils of the great city, fresh from the midnight conclaves of woodland dells. She and her assistant, Bim, a gnome, break all rules and leave the moonlight and the mist, the flowers and the voices, to visit the town and see what is going on, and, with the aid of their magic powers, they accomplish more in a short spell of hard work than all the societies for the alleviation of misery have done since their formation. But then they went the right way about it—they changed men's thoughts and desires. June's wand is omnipotent; at city banquets, touching the lips of financial magnates, it sets free a contagious eloquence which pleads for kindness and love; the influence spreads until it reaches Parliament, and the whole nation is steeped in a spirit of good-fellowship.

In "Paradise Court," a grim purlieu of the East End, Bim, meanwhile, is busy in his own method. He introduces a violet, and the unusual sight causes a struggle and ends in the demolition of the flower; a primrose next—this time the tiny blossom is defended by everybody, and presently the atmosphere of the court changes:

'Arry Bailey was the instrument of the next progressive step. He had some nasturtiums and was ambitious of getting them to climb in festoons round his window. He used nails, string, language and glue. At last he succeeded. For a time his nasturtiums were the rage. Their blazing colours and rapid growth made them popular. But Bailey, in whom the æsthetic sense must have been recovering after years of hibernation, felt that something was lacking. He smoked three ounces of shag and scratched his chin for hours on end before it dawned on him what it was. Then he said, "By gum"—and proceeded to surprise the Court by cleaning his window. . . . The inhabitants began to feel proud, to give themselves airs, to wash their necks.

It is a very pretty idyll, told with great taste and skill. But the pity of it all is that we cannot lay hands on such fairies and persuade them to come to London.

The Story of Thyrsa. By ALICE BROWN. (Constable, 6s.)

THROUGH a certain type of American novel runs a strain of mystical tenderness, the cause of which it is not easy to define. Whether it comes from the language used, the quaint, shortened syllables that seem, even in print, to convey something of the appeal of the spoken word, or from the surroundings pictured, unfamiliar to English readers, we can hardly say; but at any rate the author of "Thyrsa" possesses this secret and employs the power derived therefrom with altogether pleasant skill.

Thyrsa is romantic; as a child she has dreams of some day being able to play the piano, of having a lover, of taking a part in the great world that lies beyond her mother's little farmstead; she invests every commonplace thing with a halo born of her private visions. Andy McAdam, too, who was to spoil her life, was a bit of a dreamer:

Of all things Andy liked to take a stick for measurement and pretend it was a foot-rule, and he loved to carry a twig in his mouth in the certainty that it was really a nail and that he should presently drive it somewhere, straight and swift. It was his own particular game. The girls, he was sure, never suspected that private pastime. They thought he was simply sauntering about, rebuking their foolishness: whereas he was really having a remarkably good time.

This is the portion of the book that we prefer, with its delightful studies of childhood and its descriptions of the life of the district; we will give a brief paragraph in illustration. Thyrsa had been naughty—unkind to one of her playmates:

The day passed and nothing happened. Thyrsa looked at least for a thunder-shower, which she had grown to consider an expression of feeling on the part of a capricious God. That was a working theory in Leafy Road. When the clouds darkened in the west feminine conversation took on a conciliatory tinge. No one criticised a neighbour, and no one referred to anything ecclesiastical save in tones of highest reverence.

The habit of life changed. Chairs were set in tumbler, and children were perched on them gingerly, because, though it was desirable that the children should not be struck, it was also unnecessary that the tumbler should be broken. Sometimes all the female members of the family piled together upon a feather-bed, thence addressing adjurations to the male who would sit by the window, and perhaps even smoke his pipe. Thyrsa looked for some such significant finish to the day; but the west shone clear and even the winds were still.

Thyrsa, grown a fine, slim, imaginative girl, yields to Andy when aflame with the glamour of new-found passion; but Andy is a coward at heart; he marries her sister and leaves her to her lonely life with the child whose upbringing is at once her comfort and her pain. We rebel a little when Barton Gorse, the bookish, friendly, gentle man who had tutored Thyrsa in her youth and was always pressing her to marry him, is killed in an accident just as poor Thyrsa seemed on the brink of happiness; not that we have any particular inclination to the conventional "happy ending," but we think Miss Alice Brown might have spared that last cruelty of fate. Otherwise the book has that attraction and half-sad laughter which seems peculiarly a property of novels that deal with country life in the States.

MAY

THE days are long past when the Maypole used to be carried riotously through the London streets and erected in the Strand, but the spirit of the Spring-time—which inspired all ancient May revels—still lives. It quickens the life of the city precisely as it vivifies the whole land. The vistas of huge houses and shops are no longer sombre—here and there across them trees rise like green flames to heaven; the squares, so long haunted by the dingy fog-wreaths of winter, are fresh and clear in the breeze, gay with tulips and lilac-clusters, hardly recognisable as the sober spaces we knew a month or two ago. We realise dimly what sunshine can do when it has freedom from the smoky canopy of winter; we feel that only for a few weeks once a year do we really glimpse what our great city might be were it set beneath more fortunate skies. But we do not make any disturbance about it now; it was in the days of old, when we were not so busy learning to fly, learning to annihilate space and time, that the elf of Maytime crept into men's hearts and bade them laugh and make merry with a joy that was not artificial. How enthusiastically they used to commemorate the advent of the "merry month" in those less sophisticated times! The Maypole was a sturdy institution then; drawn sometimes by many yoke of oxen, each animal decorated with a nosegay, it was reared on each village green to become the centre for dances and diversions innumerable. London, in spite of present stolid indifference as far as her inhabitants are concerned, once took a prominent place in the May festivities. "One can imagine," writes Washington Irving, "what a gay scene it must have been in jolly old London when the doors were decorated with flowering branches, when every hat was decked with hawthorn, and Robin Hood, Friar Tuck, Maid Marian, the morris-dancers, and all the other fantastic masks and revellers were performing their antics about the Maypole in every part of the city." He regrets even then the decline of the celebrations, and his concluding words might have been written yesterday: "Some attempts have been made of late years by men of taste and learning to rally back the popular feeling to standards of primitive simplicity; but the time has gone by, the feeling has become chilled by habits of gain and traffic; the country apes the manners and amusements of the town, and little is heard of May-day at present, except from the lamentations of authors, who sigh after it from among the brick walls of the city." An old chronicler puts on record that "King Henry the Eighth, on May-day in the morning, with Queene Katharine, his wife, accompanied with many lords and ladies, rode a-Maying from Greenwich to the high ground of Shooter's Hill, where, as they passed by the way, they espyed a company of tall yeomen, clothed all in greene, with greene hoods, and with bowes and arrowes, to the number of two hundred. One, being their chieftaine, was called Robin Hood, who required the King and all his company to stay and see his men shoot; whereunto the King granting, Robin Hood whistled, and all the archers shot off, loosing all at once; and when he whistled againe, they likewise shot againe; their arrows whistled by craft of the head, so that the noise was strange and loud, which greatly delighted the King, the Queene, and their company. . . . I find, also, that in the month of May the citizens of London (of all estates) lightly in every parish, or sometimes two or three parishes joyning together, had their several Mayings, and did fetch in Maypoles, with divers warlike shewes, with good archers, moricedancers, and other devises for pastime all the day long; and towards the evening they had stage-plays and bonfires in the streets." One can imagine it, and that is all. A Maypole was set up in Leadenhall Street, in the Strand, at the north end of Drury Lane, and in many other parts of the city, while the select quarter we now know as Mayfair in the eighteenth century owned more justifiable right to its name; an open space extended to Tyburn Lane (now Park Lane), where a chaos of shows was in progress, not unlike Bartholomew Fair. "The sports not under cover were mountebanks, fire-eaters, ass-racing, sausage-tables, dice-tables, up-and-downs, merry-go-rounds, bull-baiting, grinning for a hat, running for a shift, hasty-pudding eaters, eel-divers, and an infinite variety of other similar pastimes."

In the country districts lads and lasses would sally forth early on May-morning to gather and bind the scented blossom; then, returning by sunrise, they would adorn the house with branch and flower, and devote the remainder of the day to sports and fun. Spenser mentions this in his "Shepherd's Calendar":

Youths folke now flocken in every where
To gather May-busquets, and smelling breere;
And home they hasten, the postes to dight,
And all the kirke pillars, ere daylight,
With hawthorne buds, and sweet eglantine,
And girlonds of roses, and soppes in wine.

Poetical quotation must be strictly limited, for it would take a large volume to reproduce all that the poets have penned concerning May; Herrick, however, sings so quaintly and beautifully to his "Corinna" that we must allow him a representative stanza:

Come, let us goe, while we are in our prime
And take the harmlesse follie of the time.
We shall grow old apace and die
Before we know our liberty.
Our life is short, and our dayes run
As fast away as do's the sunne;
And as a vapour, or a drop of raine
Once lost, can ne'r be found againe,
So when or you or I are made
A fable, song, or fleeting shade,
All love, all liking, all delight
Lies down'd with us in endless night.
Then, while time serves, and we are but decaying,
Come, my Corinna, come, let's goe a-Maying.

There was a regular and definite plan upon which these pastimes were based. First came six young men as woodlanders, with axes upon their shoulders and ivy-leaves twined round their heads; they were followed by six maidens who led a sleek cow ornamented with ribbons and flowers; six foresters succeeded, with bugles dangling from silken strings. A falconer personated Robin Hood, attended by page and butler and ten bowmen; two girls strewed blossoms for Maid Marian, who followed, supported by bridesmaids; then after Friar Tuck and his retinue came the Maypole. The villagers having contributed garlands, the pole was erected amid the blowing of the horns and great acclamations, and the pageant began in earnest, to be kept up for the rest of the day. In the London revels the milkmaids' garlands and the procession of chimney-sweepers used to be notable features; but different localities had, of course, their own customs. At Penzance the musicians of the neighbourhood used to perform at midnight and pay a round of visits not unlike the Christmas manner of carol-singing; special cakes were baked, the west-country junket was in great request, and away they went as day dawned to search for the blossoming boughs. In Wales a garland-bearer was chosen, and the dancers assembled at the village tavern; the company started off to the sound of bell-ringing and visited the hospitable farmers in the district, who offered money to the leader. This personage of fleeting fame was attired as a buffoon, and, according to the old records, acted the part remarkably well. At Hitchin men dressed up as women and assisted by their antics the general joviality; doggerel verses were also sung, curious mixtures of sentiment and religion. In Ireland parties of mummers, with a clown, paraded the villages or visited mansions in the vicinity, and the day terminated with a carousal. At Helston, in Cornwall, "Flora Day," or "Furry Day," is still celebrated on May 11th each year; the young folk dance through the town, starting from the market, headed by the mayor, and the whole place is alive with fun; a very pretty sight it is, too. Several European countries used to celebrate the arrival of summer in some distinct way, generally bearing a great resemblance to the English dancing and singing.

Hone, the benevolent chronicler of multitudinous things, gives a paragraph relating to the river Thames which is not without significance at the present day. "In the beginning of May," he says, "a steamboat for conveying passengers ascends the Thames in the morning from Queenhithe to Richmond, and returns the same day; and so she proceeds to and fro until the autumn. . . . If the day be fine, the passage is very pleasant." Alas, we cannot now go from Queenhithe to Richmond by steamer; but they could in the year of grace 1825! "If the north-east wind blow in May," he proceeds to note, "the nervous reader will experience the uneasiness which is sure to afflict him from that baleful quarter." That platitude we have had good opportunity of verifying during the present month, for rarely has an east wind been known to blow so persistently and so objectionably as it did recently, and the old adage "Ne'er cast a clout till May is out" has been amply supported. We can perhaps find consolation in another proverb to the effect that "A hot May makes a fat churchyard." As a rule, however, May earns its title to be called a "merry month." "Every heart," says Malory, "flourisheth and rejoiceth; for, as the season is lusty to behold and comfortable, so man and woman rejoice, and be glad of summer coming with her fresh flowers: for winter, with his rough winds and blasts, causeth a lusty man and woman to cower, and sit by the fire." And we cannot do better than conclude with the same delightful Malory, in his "Book of the Queen's Maying": "Therefore, like as May month flowereth and flourisheth in many gardens, so in likewise let every man of worship flourish his heart in this world; first unto God, and next unto the joy of them that he promiseth his faith unto. For there never was worshipful woman, but they loved one better than another. . . . But, first, reserve the honour unto God; and, secondly, the quarrel must come of thy lady; and such love I call virtuous love. But nowadays men cannot love, may not endure by reason; for where they be soon accorded and hasty heat soon cooleth; right so fareth love nowadays—soon hot, soon cold. This is no stability, but the old love was not so. . . . And so in likewise was love used in King Arthur's days; wherefore I liken love nowadays unto summer and winter: for, like as the one is hot and the other cold, so fareth love nowadays. Therefore, all ye that be lovers, call unto your remembrance the month of May, like as did Queen Guenever, for whom I make here a little mention, that while she lived she was a true lover, and there she had a good end." It is the very spirit of May, the merry month, and the month of love.

CANON CLEWORTH

ON Monday in Passion Week the death of Canon Cleworth deprived the Church of England of a devoted servant and thousands of churchmen of a trusted and admired leader. Seven years ago Canon Cleworth was an unknown Lancashire incumbent: to-day few names are better known than his, and innumerable prayers follow him to his rest. Only seven years—how short they seem in the retrospect, and how full of splendid work!

Canon Cleworth's opportunity came to him unexpectedly, and it did not at first disclose either its greatness or its difficulty. A few provincial clergymen met privately to take counsel together for the moment's needs. That unreported meeting was the beginning of a crusade, and of that crusade Canon Cleworth was ever the dauntless and unwearying standard-bearer. That handful of north-country clergymen grew into The Church Schools Emergency League—known now and valued throughout the length and breadth of the Kingdom—and the work of the League became the crowning achievement of Canon Cleworth's life. He gave himself to that work with a devotion which—because of its motive, its earnestness, its completeness—may well be called religious. From the first he was the leader of the League—no! he was more than its leader: he was its brain and sword. Many came to his help, but they detracted nothing from his unsought pre-eminence. From first to last the work of the League was his work.

Many hard words have been spoken of The Church Schools Emergency League, not merely by its open foes, but by some who should have been its friends. Men in high places have frowned upon it, scribblers have derided it, and prosperous Laodiceans—comfortable amid the fashionable platitudes of the descending middle course—have been roused out of their lukewarmness to denounce it as a band of mere extremists. These things have their reward—a vulgar popularity, a besmirched dignity, a pitying contempt; and Canon Cleworth had his reward—the fundamental mind of the English Church was roused to that magnificent resistance which gave the first rude shock to the self-confidence of the Liberal Government, and has (thus far) saved the Church's schools.

The earliest object of the Emergency League was to assist the trustees and managers of Church schools in dealing with the difficult administrative questions that arose under Mr. Balfour's Education Act of 1902. Even the early decisions of the Board of Education were disquieting, and a need was felt for some defensive organisation that could act promptly and independently—unhindered by the doubts and fears that made the Church's ordinary machinery insufficient. The Emergency League was intended to be such an organisation, and for two or three years it was entirely engrossed with administrative questions. It first became prominent by its opposition to Sir Wm. Anson's famous Circular (No. 512) forbidding attendance at church during school hours. The advent of the Liberal Government created new dangers, and these brought the League into the forefront of public controversy.

Canon Cleworth saw clearly and admitted fully that in very many country parishes—in "single-school areas" served by Church schools—Nonconformists are at a religious disadvantage, for the only religious instruction therein provided by the elementary schools is of a kind which they cannot accept. He did not, however, propose—as some have done—to remedy this by a general surrender of Church schools. He has sometimes been charged with caring only for "bricks and mortar." The charge is ludicrously untrue. He saw, indeed, no reason for handing over to "Cowper-Templeism" the many millions which churchmen had dedicated to Church education; he saw no reason for infidelity to the trust reposed in us by those who had contributed those millions. Therefore, he was resolute in the defence of "bricks and mortar," but his defence was primarily defence of a religious conception, not of mere property. He was profoundly convinced, not only that religion is an indispensable factor in every-day education, but also that it should be imparted in its completeness—as a discipline of life, and not merely as a preliminary information of the mind—and he rightly believed that, in the present state of public opinion, it could not be thus imparted except under the protection of denominational trusts. Unfortunately, in London, the Church has hopelessly failed to make adequate provision for the education of Church children, and this inclined many influential churchmen to think more of new opportunities than of existing rights. Canon Cleworth was not opposed to "facilities." On the contrary, he desired them. He was never willing—as some at least momentarily were—to permit "parents' rights" to supersede trust deeds, but he made those rights fundamental, and he desired to see full provision made and full opportunity given (in Church schools and in Council schools alike) for the religious instruction of dissentients—for the exceptional teaching of all those children for whom such teaching was desired. For him, however, such facilities (whether for Nonconformist children in Church schools or for Church children in Council schools) were not a denominational privilege to be bought—rather did they express a primary civic right that should be recognised. Moreover, he felt that Church facilities in Council schools would not be made completely available if they were not supported by the independent tradition and example of a strong body of distinctively Church schools.

These are the conceptions which governed the later work of The Church Schools Emergency League. How successful that work has been Mr. Birrell and his successors in Whitehall, and some in other dignities, know full well. But the success has been dearly purchased. To bring it about Canon Cleworth worked as few men have worked—on the platform, in the Press, by correspondence, in private conference. His devotion to his work was an unreserved devotion, and it brought him to a death which, by its witness for his faith, was almost a martyrdom.

DODGE

THIS word is known only from the sixteenth century, "primary meaning and sense development uncertain" (N.E.D.). The oldest examples (1568, 1575) are intransitive, and the meaning appears to be "to go this way and that in speech or action, palter, haggle, etc." The transitive use is late, e.g., Milton uses to "dodge with" (University Carrier, l. 8) where we should use only "dodge." The noun "dodger" seems to have assumed early the special meaning of "pettifogger, niggard," etc., e.g., "dodger, vitiligator, prevaricator" (Holyoak, 1612), "chiche-maille, a dodger, niggard, pinch-penny, penny-father; one that will stand whole houres haggling about a halfe penny" (Cotgrave, 1611). Professor Skeat (Concise Dict.) gives as the original meaning of the verb "to walk unsteadily." The quotations in the N.E.D. do not very clearly illustrate this, and the earliest dictionaries have already the idea of shuffling and dishonesty, e.g., "to dodge, illiberaliter se habere" (Levins, 1570), "vitiligo" (Holyoak, 1612), "vitiligare, cavill, wrangle" (Minsheu, 1617), but such an original meaning would correspond pretty closely with the idea of stepping aside or swerving associated with the modern word. Semantic parallels are prevaricate, properly "to go a-straddle, to swerve, to shuffle," G. "ausweichen, to step aside, to dodge," F. "broncher, to stumble," e.g., "Il a reçu le coup sans broncher," i.e., "without finching, without turning aside." That the idea of stumbling or wavering was inherent in dodge appears to be confirmed by Torriano (1659), who gives "dogge (cor. dodge), vacillare" and "dodger, vacillator." Florio (1598) has "vacillare, to waver, to be fickle, to stagger, to totte, to moove instantly, not to stand sure, to reele or stagger, to shake, to wagge, or waver, to be loose and inconsistent." Miège (1679) has "to dodge, balancer, être dans l'incertitude." As late as 1727 Sewel has "to dodge, wispeltuig (fickle) zyn, zyn woord niet gestand doen, weyfelden (to waver)." If then the real meaning of the word was to waver or stagger (cf. Mod. E. wobbler = dodger), its immediate source seems fairly clear. Palsgrave (762, 2) has "I tryppe, as a horse dothe that stomblesht nat out ryght, Je douge. My horse stombled nat, he did bot tryppe a lytell: mon cheval ne choppyt pas, il ne fit que douger, (or broncher), un peu." The origin of douger is less clear. Cotgrave has "douger, to trip; as a horse that stumblesht not outright (an old word)," evidently copied from Palsgrave. The only F. word with which douger can be easily connected is the adj. "doué, delicate" (L. delicatum), a favourite of Ronsard's. It has in O.F. thirteen variants (v. Godefroy, s.v. delgié), including doué, dogé, dugé. For the verb douger (marked archaic) Oudin (1660) gives only adelgaçar, which means "to make delicate, to subtilize or refine." For O.F. deugier, Godefroy gives only "traiter délicatement." These meanings are not very near that in which Palsgrave uses the word, unless we suppose that the connecting idea is that of a dainty, mincing gait (cf. the double meaning of "trip, to step daintily, to stumble"). Even then the intransitive dodge can hardly be derived from a transitive verb. Agag (1 Samuel, XV., 32) does not help us much, for the "delicately" of the Authorised Version is in the Vulgate "pinguissimus et tremens," in Wyclif "moost fat and tremblynge," and in Luther "getrost (cheerfully)." MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES
LINNEAN SOCIETY OF LONDON.

GENERAL MEETING, MAY 6TH, 1909.

DR. D. H. SCOTT, F.R.S., President, in the Chair.

The Minutes of the General Meeting of April 1st, 1909, were read and confirmed.

Mr. Joseph Pearson, M.Sc., Mr. Edward James Salisbury, B.Sc., and Mr. Frank Hicks were admitted Fellows.

Dr. William Henry Lang, M.B., C.M., and Mr. Martin Hubert Foquet Sutton were severally balloted and elected Fellows; and Professor Yves Delage and Professor Magnus Gustaf Retzius were in like manner elected Foreign Members.

Mr. Valavanur Subramania Iyer, M.A., Madras University, and Mr. William Robert Price, B.A., Cantab., were proposed as Fellows.

The following Auditors were nominated from the Chair, and by show of hands were duly elected: For the Council, Sir Frank Crisp and Professor J. P. Hill. For the Fellows, Mr. G. S. Saunders and Mr. Henry Groves.

Mr. E. A. Newell Arber explained by lantern-slides the oecology of two alpine species of Sempervivum—namely, S. arachnoideum and S. montanum; he pointed out the formation of primitive soil by three methods: (1) from crustaceous lichens; (2) mosses; and (3) decay of coniferous needles. Upon this primitive soil these Semperviva flourished and formed groups, which might be regarded as individuals or colonies, but for which he preferred the non-committal term of "pseudo-colony." The stolons, which were emitted from the rosettes, were sometimes of great length before giving rise to a daughter-rosette.

Dr. Otto Stapf followed with some additional remarks, and the author replied.

Mr. James Buckland exhibited a series of sixty lantern-slides received from the United States of America and Australia, in illustration of various species of birds in imminent danger of extinction in consequence of the commercial demand for their plumage as means of adornment. He pointed out the urgency of prohibitive legislation in order to save a multitude of birds, now rare, owing to the reckless slaughter by the plume-hunters.

The first group of slides showed the slaughter of gulls and terns on the Atlantic seaboard of the United States, so great that President Roosevelt had intervened by proclaiming certain portions as reservations, and the resultant saving of the terns in these protected sanctuaries. Next were shown the Snowy Herons on the Florida Keys Reservation; the patrol boats for the enforcement of the protective regulations; the grave of a warden shot in the execution of his duty by a bird-hunter on forbidden territory; and the nesting-habits of the Egret in Florida.

Following these came slides of plumage-birds from Oregon, California, and Venezuela, the flightless birds of New Zealand; the Birds of Paradise, Emu, Lyre-bird, various Bower-birds, and home of the Albatross, the Australian Gannet in its rookery, closing with "The cost of a plume," a series of slides showing the effect of the slaughter of the parent birds by the lingering death of the nestlings by starvation; these latter slides had been obtained by climbing with the camera to the top of the Blue Gums, in which the nests were built.

Professor A. Dendy spoke of the remarkable interest of the exhibition, and trusted that the devotion of Mr. Buckland to the cause he had so much at heart would be crowned with success. He referred to the fact that the Council of the Society had done what it could in the good cause by supporting the proposed Bill for the restriction of the importation of plumage into this country. With regard to the flightless birds of New Zealand, they occupied different ground, as the danger to which they are exposed is chiefly due to the introduction of predatory animals into the Dominion.

The first paper, by Mrs. Leonora J. Wilsmore, M.Sc., was communicated by Professor J. P. Hill, F.L.S., "On some Zoanthæ from Queensland and the New Hebrides." It was read in title by the Zoological Secretary.

The second paper, "On two New Genera of Thyranoptera from Venezuela," by Richard S. Bagnall, and communicated by Lord Avebury, F.L.S., was also formally read.

The next Meeting of the Society will be the Annual General Meeting, to be held on Monday, May 24th, 1909, at 3 p.m.

NOTICE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"MALARIA AND GREEK HISTORY."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Will you allow me to express my regret to Mr. W. H. S. Jones that my criticism concerning the omission of "christian" names from bibliographies should have fallen, contrary to my intention, on an individual writer no more open to my criticism than scores of others? I chose a book published by the Manchester University Press, in reference to which I might condemn the omissions, in the hope that that thoroughly vital University might in the future at least discourage the custom by the example of its own practice, in adding "christian" names. Mr. Jones's supposition that the surname of an author and the date of his book are quite sufficient for identification, is obviously reasonable, in the case of a library in which all the books are accessible to the reader. But in the large libraries most used for purposes of reference the books are not accessible to the reader. He has no chance of identifying a book from among others ranged before him on shelves: he is forced to hunt out the symbol arbitrarily assigned to it in a gigantic catalogue. If he does not know the author's "christian" name he may have to search many pages crowded with entries until he recognises the book he wants. When Mr. Jones next wishes to refer in the library of the British Museum to a book so familiar to him in appearance and matter as Kühn's edition of the Hippocratic "Corpus," if he does not wish to waste his time and temper he had better discover Kühn's "christian" name, or it will take him six times as long as it need to discover the unknown symbol which is the clue by which an attendant will eventually put him within sight of the book. I am not concealing Kühn's name, I merely call it "christian" for convenience. I do not know what it is, but experience has taught me not to attempt to catch sight of a copy of his edition of the Hippocratic "Corpus" in a large library until I know the name by which his parents called him.

In the second paragraph of his letter Mr. Jones expresses regret that in his Preface he lays undue stress upon the decline of the Greeks. He does not say that he refers to any adverse criticism of mine on that point, and I hope that he does not think that I implied any. On the contrary, he appeared to me, so far as a layman may judge, to emphasise the point no more than was necessary to attract attention to an ingenious and tenable theory and to excite such criticism as would assist him in expanding or modifying it according to his judgment; and I certainly intended to include him among expert investigators of the whole question.

THE REVIEWER of Malaria and Greek History.

POETS' PROSE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In common with your industrious correspondent, "A French Linguist," I was particularly struck with the remark upon the above subject in your admirable article entitled "The Commercial Muse," but, unlike him, I was so happy as to find myself in exact agreement with the opinion there expressed.

The contrary view which your correspondent upholds in his interesting letter was developed by our English critic, Hazlitt, in a well-known essay, and unquestionably obtains very widely at the present time. Does it not rest, however, on a false antithesis between the two forms of writing, due to a misapprehension of the real nature of both?

Surely, the true belief on this important matter is that which was held by your correspondent's countryman, the illustrious Flaubert, according to whom poetry is the absolute and best expression of human thought. In this view, prose is essentially writing of the second order, being, as it were, poetry in the making. How inevitably the one finds its fulfilment in the other may be seen in many passages of our most celebrated prose-writers which lack nothing but mere artifice of printing to recommend them as poetry to the reader.

If poetry is indeed the most perfect form of writing, those who achieve it can hardly fail of mastery on the lower ground, and, in fact, the list of poets who have so excelled is too lengthy to recall. The fact that some great poets have sometimes written bad prose must be taken with the fact that some great poets have sometimes written bad poetry, and must be attributed not to any antagonism between poetry and prose, but to the nature of human genius and its unequal and discontinuous expression.

Your correspondent objects that poetry is an improper medium in which to write about common things. I agree: if by writing mere description is meant. It is improper to write about common things at all unless they are thereby deprived of their commonness and given that unique and individual character which alone constitutes life in the world of art. This poetry can accomplish more easily and more effectually than prose.

Perhaps I may be allowed to add that I am led to make these comments in the hope that we may be privileged at some time to receive a fuller exposition of this subject, so vital to the formation of correct taste, from one who, as his published writings manifest, is above all others competent to treat of it in a noble and authoritative manner.

THE BUDGET AND THE JEWS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Why do you lay the blame for the plundering Budget on our alleged Government? I venture to say that the few money-pigs who finance the party in power had far more to do with the preparation of the Budget than any one member of the Government. The persons who should be blamed are the wealthy Englishmen who compel the two political parties to depend on the aliens for funds. The Radicals are in power, and we are ruled by the tools of the Hoggeneimers who finance the party, because when the Conservatives were in power the interests of the party and country were continually betrayed at the bidding of the Hoggeneimers who finance the Conservative party. If wealthy Englishmen whose money is invested in their own country object to being plundered by the puppets of alien tax-dodgers, they should see that the British and patriotic party is not dependent on the aliens for any portion of its funds, and that the party is represented in the metropolis by at least two or three daily and political weekly journals not owned, edited, subsidised, or otherwise controlled by the aliens, nor dependent on the alien advertisers for support. Then when the Conservatives are in power they would remain in power, as the Government would be conducted solely in the interests of the British. Up to the present time fellow-tribesmen of Messrs. Reubens, of Whitechapel, and of Mr. Slater, of Glasgow, have been chosen as Conservative candidates for the next election in a score or more electoral divisions. This is due, in every case, to the need of money to fight the election, not to the lack of a native candidate. From present appearances it would seem that when the Conservatives regain power the country and party will be betrayed over the matter of Tariff Reform just as it was over the matter of restricting immigration. Instead of the great and purely British industry of agriculture receiving protection, it will probably be a number of undesirable industries which have been captured by Yiddish sweaters, and, thanks to Churchill's Anti-Sweating Act, will soon employ none but Yiddish coolies, who will, of course, evade the Act without difficulty. Then the country will be more disgusted than ever. When the election occurs the Conservatives will be defeated worse than ever, and as by then "Our Vinstun" will have become an enthusiastic convert to Socialism, we shall have a half-caste Amurrikun for Prime Minister.

POET AND LAWYER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In "Musings Without Method" in the May Blackwood a sarcastic writer on the Shakespeare-Bacon controversy remarks: "Though a poet may understand law, no lawyer was ever a poet." Not much method in this musing. Perhaps the writer never heard of Sir Walter Scott and James Russell Lowell.

The musér—we might almost call him amuser—might turn his attention with profit to Mark Twain's new book, "Is Shakespeare Dead?" especially the chapter "Was the Author of Shakespeare's Works a Lawyer?" Here Mark says: "I would put aside the guesses, and surmises, and perhaps, and might-have-beens, and could-have-beens, and we-are-justified-in-presumings, and the rest of those vague spectres and shadows and indefinitenesses, and stand or fall, win or lose, by the verdict rendered by the jury upon that single question. If the verdict was yes, I should feel quite convinced that the Stratford Shakespeare, the actor, manager, and trader who died so obscure, so forgotten, so destitute of even village consequence that sixty years afterward no fellow-citizen and friend of his later days remembered to tell anything about him, did not write the works."

Not bad, Mark. Another convert, evidently, to the side of Bacon. G. S.

SEAMAN'S MANNERS.

SIR,—You are one of the few people who have dared to suggest that Punch is occasionally brutal. You are quite right, and I would add that he is also occasionally snobbish. In his last issue he exemplifies both faults. He has a picture of an old maid who is teaching a class of small girls, one of whom remarks that a knowledge of geography does not lead to marriage—witness the teacher's celibacy. That is a brutal sort of jest and could only have been made endurable by depicting the teacher a comely person.

In another picture we have a vulgar "lady" complaining that she had been unable to obtain a nice hat at some shop or other (she is wearing a "horror"), and a duchess who is present says, "So sorry we could not please you. That shop is one of my ventures," or words to that effect. Tableau! The underlying idea, of course, is that the parvenue ought to feel properly crushed. The faces of the company show this. But the parvenue had only to say, "I should have thought your Grace would have shown as good taste in hats as in conversation," to turn the tables. In a word, the whole conception is snobbish.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

The toil, the strife, the humour and pathos of life on the great waters are depicted in intensely vivid and striking language. A sailor by profession, Mr. Brooke has gifts of insight, imagination, observation and description that are usually associated only with the born storyteller.

THE BOOK OF THE WEEK

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

The Daily Chronicle says: "Mr. Buxton had an opportunity of seeing and hearing things in the best quarter for information, and the result, whether or not it be history as time will finally write, is a very vivid, picturesque account of the transformation of Turkey."

The Bookman says: "A very definite value is attached to this timely volume, for the author of it—a keen student of the East and Eastern affairs—had the good fortune to be in Turkey both shortly before and shortly after the Revolution, and his pages are as stirring as scenes upon a stage. . . . Whatever our own judgments or shade of politics, we can gain only good from this enthusiastic and graphic account of a fiery piece of history."

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM

The Sunday Chronicle says: "Everything that the Barnetts write on Social Reform is worth reading, for they are among the very few social reformers who know what they are writing about."

OLIVE IN ITALY

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "Mr. Fisher Unwin has introduced many new writers of good fiction in his 'First Novel' Series. We venture to think that Moray Dalton will take high rank in the list. 'Olive in Italy' is vivid and picturesque, and the writer has a rare sense of the inevitable nature of real tragedy. The name 'Moray Dalton' on the cover of a second book should ensure an instant welcome."

LOLA MONTEZ:

An Adventuress of the 'Forties

By EDMUND B. d'AUVERGNE.

Hand-Coloured Photogravure Frontispiece. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

LOLA MONTEZ was the most beautiful woman of her time. Animated by insatiable ambition, and possessed of heroic courage, she astonished the old and the new worlds with her audacity and daring. In the 18th Century she would have played a part greater than the Pompadours. The greatest geniuses of her time fell victims to her fascinations. For two years she ruled Bavaria as uncrowned queen, defeating the machinations of the most powerful enemies, and ruling wisely and well. Her free use of the horse-whip upon her opponents' shoulders delighted and astonished her contemporaries. She was the friend of Dumas and the most brilliant wits of that brilliant period. She wandered over the whole world, now appearing in India, now in California, now in Australia, ending at last, like Pelagia and La Vallière, almost in the odour of sanctity.

Mr. d'Auvergne tells her story sympathetically, and aims not only at portraying the woman, but also the animated and varied backgrounds against which she moved.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE dinner of the Council of the Men's League for Opposing Woman Suffrage took place on Tuesday last at the Hotel Cecil, under the presidency of the Earl of Cromer, and was an unqualified success. Able speeches were made by Lord Cromer, by the two guests of the evening, Lord Curzon of Kedleston and Lord James of Hereford, by Mr. Massie, M.P., Sir Edward Clarke, and the Dean of Canterbury. Lord Curzon was in particularly good form, and his speech with its wit and closely reasoned argument was undoubtedly the outstanding feature of the evening. As far as we are concerned we make no complaints, and we found ourselves in hearty agreement with every one of his Lordship's remarks. At the same time, it might well be argued that in view of the presence of a large number of Liberals, including many Liberal Members of Parliament, Lord Curzon might have moderated his more scathing remarks about the present Government. To one of these Liberal Members of Parliament, namely the Hon. Ivor Guest, the anti-suffrage movement owes an inestimable debt; and a dinner of the Men's League for Opposing Woman Suffrage was perhaps hardly a fitting occasion on which to "rub in" to Mr. Guest and his fellow Liberals the follies and iniquities of the party with which they are unfortunately connected. However, these be toys. But we should like seriously to suggest to the Anti-Suffrage League that its Press organisation is very defective. For instance, neither the Standard of Wednesday, nor the Evening Standard of that day contained any reference whatever to the dinner and the speeches made. Yet if we are not very much mistaken the representative of the Standard was present and ate a very hearty meal. And the same applies to the representative of the Westminster Gazette, which organ of light and leading was equally dumb as far as any report of the proceedings is concerned. The Men's League for Opposing Woman Suffrage wants all the money it can get for the furtherance of its excellent work, and it certainly cannot afford to provide free dinners to hungry journalists, whether they be of the "Liberal" or "Conservative" persuasion, without exacting some sort of quid pro quo. The Standard professes to be opposed to Women's Suffrage, and it has constantly shown its devotion to the cause by reporting at great length the sayings and doings of the Pankhursts and other members of the gang which Lord Curzon appropriately describes as "howling dervishes." It is a little extraordinary, to say the least of it, that it finds itself unable to devote even a short paragraph to the side of the question which it professes to uphold when people of the intellectual and political eminence of Lord Curzon and Lord James of Hereford enunciate their views. We sincerely hope that we are not going to have a repetition in the case of Mr. Pearson's organ of the startling change of front indulged in by the organ of Baron Burnham. But we should not be surprised if the same subtle influences which induced the Daily Telegraph to execute a complete volte face on this question were to operate in the case of Pearson's penny daily.

It seems to be pretty well universally admitted among those who have any claim to speak with authority that the House of Lords not only has the power to throw out the Budget neck and crop, but that it intends to exercise that power. For the past two or three weeks the Observer has been pluming itself on its sagacity in prophesying the probability of such an event. We are sorry to rob the Observer of its cause for self-congratulation; but we really must point out that no less than five months ago in THE ACADEMY of December 19th, in an article entitled "Supererogatory Tarantara at the National Liberal Club," we made use of the following words:

It is generally understood that the "gauntlet" to be flung down to the Peers will take the form of a Socialistic and confiscatory Budget of the most outrageous description, a hen-roost robbery on an unprecedented scale of predatory magnificence. The Lords having once more outraged the "will of the People" by kicking the Budget contemptuously downstairs, the great Liberal party will then go to the country and demand the lungs and livers of these wicked persons, their blood, or such blood as they may lose, being, as has been already explained by the excitable Mr. Birrell, "on their own heads."

Since then we have on several occasions re-emphasised our conviction as to the probable course of events. So that the Observer must make up its mind on this occasion to take a very far back seat among the minor prophets. At the same time we are able to congratulate the editor of the Observer on the fact that, unlike the great Mr. St. Loe Strachey, he evidently has the good sense to read THE ACADEMY.

The Government and Mr. McKenna have come very badly out of the affair of Captain Bacon's letters to the First Sea Lord containing reflections on Mr. Bellairs. The whole business is discreditable in the extreme, and the shuffling excuses of Mr. McKenna will not be accepted for a moment by any fair-minded man. Lord Winterton in the House of Commons on Wednesday last asked Mr. McKenna whether he proposed "to observe the ordinary standard of honour," and Mr. McKenna drew the attention of the Speaker to this observation; whereupon Lord Winterton, without waiting to hear the Speaker's ruling, got up and said: "May I say that as my observation was obviously disorderly, of course I withdraw it." For our part we fail to see anything "obviously disorderly" in Lord Winterton's question. On the contrary, it seems to us to be a perfectly proper question to ask, and it is a great pity that Lord Winterton should be in such a hurry to eat his own words. There can be nothing more foolish than to make strong remarks on a matter about which one entertains strong feelings and then in the same breath, as it were, to admit that they were "obviously disorderly." There are occasions when strong remarks ought to be made, and when the courage to make them is laudable and creditable, and persons who having made such remarks have not got the pluck to stick to them had better make up their minds in the future to hold their tongues altogether. Lord Winterton, who has lately become editor of one of the Harmsworth publications, seems to be rapidly imbibing Harmsworthian methods of controversy. They will not add to his reputation, and their exhibition in the House of Commons is distressing to those who at one time had hopes of Lord Winterton's future as a serious politician.

Referring to some playful remarks which we made last week about the late Mr. Justice Day's pictures and the hobbies of various other judges, we have received a letter from a correspondent who gravely rebukes us and takes us to task for "following the unworthy example of certain disreputable penny and sixpenny weekly papers which never lose an opportunity for making rude remarks about judges." Our correspondent goes on to assure us that he has the highest esteem for THE ACADEMY and the greatest admiration for its "bold and brilliant attitude." Our correspondent is most kind, but the compliments of a gentleman who is capable of so completely misunderstanding us as he does do not afford us unmixed contentment. We did not think that it was possible for any of our readers to mistake our perfectly harmless and good-natured persiflage about Mr. Justice Grantham, Mr. Justice Darling, and the Lord Chief Justice for "rudeness," and we have far too much respect for these eminent men to suppose that they themselves would have so interpreted our paragraph if they happened to read it. There is no judge on the Bench for whom we entertain a more sincere admiration than Mr. Justice Grantham; he is a fine gentleman in the truest sense of the word as well as a remarkably able and fearless judge. The ill-bred sneers directed against him from time to time in certain of our less reputable contemporaries can in almost every case be directly traced to the malignance of disappointed litigators, and as such they are beneath contempt. We have an equal respect and admiration for Mr. Justice Darling and the Lord Chief Justice, and that we should be impelled by the letter of a professing admirer of THE ACADEMY to say so flatly and definitely is almost an absurdity. There are some things which really ought to be taken for granted by people who profess to be one's friends.

We have received further letters from people who are anxious to argue the question of imperfect rhymes and to justify them by quotations from the best poets. Curiously enough, one of these letters emanates from Oxford and another from Cambridge. The efforts of our correspondents are wrong-headed and perverse, for, say what they will, a bad rhyme remains a bad rhyme even if it can be proved to have been used by Shakespeare and Milton and other great poets. Elderly, white-bearded gentlemen at our two great seats of learning may sit through the midnight watches in the turreted chambers of venerable buildings, with all the weight of classical knowledge and classical traditions at their backs, rhyming "flower" with "paramour" till all is blue, but we shall not cease to protest against such violations of the poetical art and to deplore the misdirection to budding youth which is implied in such senile aberrations and deviations from the true path of poetical rectitude.

The Dean of Westminster is a powerful person. It lies within his prerogative to decide whether the honour of being buried in Westminster Abbey shall be accorded to a man or not. He has refused to receive the ashes of George Meredith; and he will give no reasons. The usual reason as to limitations of space would not avail in this case; because the ashes of even the greatest of us can take up very little room indeed. So that we are left with the high and dry fact that, for some reason or other, George Meredith is not considered by the Dean of Westminster to be quite "worthy" of such post mortem distinction as the Dean has it in his province to bestow. Perhaps Mr. Meredith's peculiar views about marriage, expressed by him in an interview with a hapenny reporter—and not in his books—perhaps it is these views which have influenced Dean Robinson's decision. Apart from the higher rights and wrongs of the matter, Dean Robinson is a bold man, inasmuch as his refusal to receive into the Abbey Mr. Meredith's ashes is made in the teeth of the desires of the Lord Mayor of London, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Sir William Huggins, and the Authors' Society. If the Dean would always be as difficult as he would appear now to be Westminster Abbey might indeed become the place of sepulchre for truly great Englishmen only. However, we expect that George Meredith will be very content at Dorking, even as Algernon Charles Swinburne rests himself comfortably at Bonchurch. And we can quite see that the Dean of Westminster may, in the course of time, want all the space he can muster for the accommodation of the mortal remains of those authors whose sales so enlarge the souls of Mr. Shorter and Dr. Robertson Nicoll. On the other hand, let not these gentry be at all puffed up. Probably all of them, in spite of the portents, will have to make shift at Kensal Rise.

We note with feelings suitable to the occasion that Mr. Swinburne has left an estate valued at nineteen thousand nine hundred and ninety-six pounds five shillings net. The enlightened and intelligent newspaper press of the penny plain and hapenny coloured varieties has commented prettily on the fact, and points out with great acumen that, when all is said, poetry of the right sort is "a paying proposition." We are afraid, however, that Mr. Swinburne's nineteen thousand pounds net was not altogether the result of the sale of his books. If he made five hundred a year out of poetry, even in the later years of his life, we should be surprised. Of course, no reasonable poet should desire to compass more. And we do not think that Mr. Swinburne cared twopence whether he made money or not. We have known him refuse lump sums which any writer in the world, except Swinburne, would have jumped at. The trouble about literature as a profession at the present moment is that the larger number of persons engaged in it feel themselves to be outraged because they can never hope to be millionaires. The other day we had the spectacle of the Saturday Review howling horribly over "the bitter, lonely life" of a pensioned poet who could not afford "to entertain a few friends to dinner at the Criterion Restaurant." The Saturday would have us believe that it was the duty of the people of England either to buy this poet's works in quantities which would have enabled him "to entertain a few friends to dinner at the Criterion Restaurant," or to increase his pension from a hundred and fifty pounds to such a sum as would have enabled him "to entertain a few friends to dinner at the Criterion Restaurant." Apparently, therefore, a thousand a year is the least sum which, in reason, you can offer to a poet. And the Saturday goes on to talk of the reviewers who are earning fifteen hundred a year. Do they earn it on the Saturday, one wonders? It is singular that never by any chance does the competent poet call loudly for money. If we remember rightly, Tennyson's pension was a hundred a year. It may have been a hundred and fifty, or it may have been two hundred. In any case, for the best part of his life Tennyson was a poor man.

And his poverty delayed his marriage, and no doubt prevented him entertaining his friends at the Criterion Restaurant. Yet he managed to hide it, and he always wrote in the tone of a gentleman of large property, even after he came into his pension. It is all a question of breeding and sound poetical parts. A man who puts his hand into the fire for the sake of poetry gets burnt, but he does not want anybody's pity or anybody's tears. A man who puts his hand into the fire for the sake of poetical rewards gets burnt and makes a fearful noise about it. In justice to the Saturday Review, we ought to mention that the Saturday's article is signed by the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail. This explains everything, excepting the fact that the Saturday has printed the article.

The Saturday must learn to refrain from cant in literary affairs. Nothing in the world can make the public buy poetry or prose which they do not want. Before you can induce them to buy poetry you must teach them to want it. They have been taught to want certain poets, as, for example, Shakespeare, and, for that matter, Tennyson. But it will be found that even the sales of Shakespeare and of Tennyson are as a molehill to a mountain compared with the sales of some of our "clever" novelists. So that the work of education is either a difficult affair or it has been grossly mismanaged. For ourselves, we lean to the opinion that it is grossly and flagrantly mismanaged. We believe that, in spite of the wholesale corruption of the public taste which nearly every newspaper and nearly every publishing house has attempted for the sake of gain, the public taste is far sounder and far surer than it is imagined to be. And we also believe that the public's slowness in taking to its bosom this, that, or the other poet is proof positive that the public possesses taste, and that in a blind and stumbling way it recognises that the chiefest danger of letters is not apathy or failure of recognition, but swiftness to hail fools on the bare and interested word of boomsters and persons who are out for profit.

From John Bull we cull the following poetic gem:

There are loyal hearts, there are spirits brave,
There are souls that are pure and true!
Then give to the world the best you have
And the best will come back to you.
Give love, and love to your life will flow,
A strength in your utmost need;
Have faith, and a score of hearts will show
Their faith in your word and deed.
Give truth, and your gifts will be paid in kind,
And honour will honour meet;
And a smile that is sweet will surely find
A smile that is just as sweet!

Surely the last two lines are a little personal? They suggest Bottomley smiling at Vivian and Vivian smiling back again at Bottomley. Or a little deal in smiles between Mr. Odhams of the Guardian and Mr. Elias of the Hairdresser's Review. Smiles apart, however, we have not by any means finished with the "secret history" of the Bottomley affair.

The Isis has apologised again, and has paid damages and costs. This is as it should be, though it makes us yawn. We shall now hope to lie down in peace with Oxford and Cambridge for at least a fortnight. It seems, however, that there is a newspaper called the East Anglian Daily Times. This paper has made serious imputations against us, and of course, it has apologised, and is going to apologise still further. Life is a tiresome business; anger is short madness, and pride goeth before a fall. We do trust that we shall not have to chronicle more than half-a-dozen apologies during Whit Week.

THE CHARMED POOL

(From the French of Albert Samain.)

My heart is as a charmed pool that trembles,
The secret haunt of birds and foliage frail,
And where the silver flight of sylphs assembles
In the clear eve, when blossoms fade and fail;

The dreaming moon her paleness images,
The Dawn her warm feet in its crystal dips;
Its margin sighs eternal harmonies
From the tall reed-pipes' unappeased lips.

"MERE NERVOUS DEGENERATES"

THE Daily Mail of yesterday publishes an article entitled "The Phantom Airship." The article is dated "Berlin," and it is signed "Northcliffe." It is an article which purports to be on the side of reason. The author commences by pointing out that "Accounts of phantom German airships alleged to be flying over England and the North Sea . . . are placing England and Englishmen in a ridiculous and humiliating light before the German people." In support of this statement we are favoured with a quotation from the Berliner Neueste Nachrichten:

Things which are being said and done in England in these days strike us Germans as magnificent material for farce and comedy. But the ridiculousness of it all is only one side of the matter. Madness is also dangerous. If we had to deal only with poor lunatics who hear a guilty conscience knocking on water, in the air, and under the earth and water, and label it "German danger," it would not be necessary to waste a single word.

What stands out conspicuously is the lack of any sturdy resistance to these hallucinations in the English public. There are certainly millions of Englishmen who are not only not participating in this mad procedure, but who wholly abhor it and are deeply chagrined over it. But they remain dumb. We miss the voice of shame and anger with which a great nation should command the propagators of such witchery to keep silent.

With a view no doubt to obliging the Berliner Neueste Nachrichten the Daily Mail's correspondent, Northcliffe, proceeds to raise "the voice of shame and anger" which our German contemporary so misses, and he raises it to the following beautiful effect:

There is nothing quieter in the world than a powder magazine the second before it explodes. A spark falling suddenly in the midst of public temper can convert long-gathering exasperation into a conflagration. It is dangerous sparks of this kind which Englishmen term untoward events—events which nobody could foresee, which, without warning, come to pass and stir and excite popular passions with elemental fury.

There has certainly been no lack recently of symptoms indicating what has been resting on the English national mind. For the most part our idea of good taste has simply been offended by what has been gossiped about nefarious German plans. In the consciousness that these tales are mere phantasies we shrug our shoulders. The invasion danger, the 40,000 waiter-spies, the airship cruising over England at night, compel our ridicule. . . .

Germans, who have so long been accustomed to regard Great Britain as a model of national deportment, poise, and cool-headedness, are beginning to believe that England is becoming the home of mere nervous degenerates.

We are compelled to assume that the Northcliffe who signs this article is none other than our old friend Alfred Harmsworth, commonly known as Baron Northcliffe of the Isle of Thanet. There is a faith somewhere which is big enough to remove mountains. There is a charity in this office which is big enough to assume that Lord Northcliffe's article is inspired by the most honest and patriotic motives, and that Lord Northcliffe is writing in the absence of a knowledge of certain facts with which he might reasonably have been supposed to have acquainted himself. The Daily Mail, which is now convinced that the "invasion danger, the forty thousand waiter-spies, and the airship cruising over England at night, compel our ridicule," and the Daily Mail which believes that "the Germans are beginning to believe that England is becoming the home of mere nervous degenerates" is owned by a company called The Associated Newspapers, Limited, of which company the aforesaid Lord Northcliffe is the Chairman and principal shareholder, and by an extraordinary coincidence this same Associated Newspapers, Limited, owns and conducts and prints and publishes a paper called the Evening News. On Thursday of last week the Evening News came out with half a column headed "The Illusive Airship." "To-day," says the Evening News, "we have received signed statements from the persons who say that they have actually seen it." On Saturday of last week the Evening News had a column and a half on the subject, together with a large map showing in black type the names of places where the airship is said to have been seen. On Monday of the present week the Evening News had three-quarters of a column headed "The Ghostly Airship—Its Week-end Visit to Lowestoft—Observers' Stories." On Tuesday there was another front page column. On Wednesday there was a column and a half of front page, headed "The Secret Airship," and sub-headed "Distinctly Seen" and "Clouds of Witnesses," and on Thursday there were two front page columns in which "the spectral ship" was reported to have been seen near London and to have visited Southend, Norwich and Monmouth. And on Friday the Daily Mail produces Lord Northcliffe's beautiful article. Now we assert that the Evening News has deliberately worked this airship business on the lines of the scoop; we assert that it has given a serious colour to the details and signed statements which it has raked up at great expense, and that the whole business, in so far as it can affect Germany, is the creation of the Evening News. We do not say that the Evening News invented the original rumours or that its signed statements are not bonâ fide statements. But we do say that if, as Lord Northcliffe would have us believe, the affair has assumed a dangerous international aspect that dangerous aspect has been created by the Evening News, and that this has been done not in the interests of the public, but for the mere purpose of selling newspapers. If, as Lord Northcliffe asserts, the airship compels ridicule, why have his journals been taking it seriously and dealing with it as the principal topic of the moment for over a week past? And if England has become the home of mere nervous degenerates to whom in the name of goodness are we to attribute their nervous degeneration as exhibited in the matter of this airship, if not to this very Evening News and to this very Lord Northcliffe who now lifts up his voice in shame and anger on the subject? The bare fact that Lord Northcliffe can write with unblushing effrontery what he writes in yesterday's Daily Mail the while his other journal, the Evening News, is engaged in manufacturing or elaborating the self-same scares and phantasies and foolish fictions and inflammable rumours and pin-pricks of which he complains is an appalling commentary on the Harmsworth methods and the absolute contempt which the Harmsworths have always shown for the mere nervous degenerates they have succeeded in creating in this country. Lord Northcliffe cannot have it both ways. He cannot make hapence out of scares and then turn round and have us believe that he is a patriot and that there is wisdom in anything he may have to tell us. If Germany is so mad as to take a serious view of the airship scare and if the scare is, as Lord Northcliffe asserts, calculated to provoke war and "its incalculable consequences" the blame does not rest with the English people or with its leaven of Harmsworth-bred nervous degenerates, but with the Evening News and Lord Northcliffe. In point of fact, there will be no war and there will be no complications. Germany is not ripe for either. You can fool the public most of the time, but not all the time, and if Lord Northcliffe is not very careful he will very shortly discover that there is a limit to the patience and stupidity of even nervous degenerates.

GEORGE MEREDITH

GEORGE MEREDITH is dead, and for thousands the bright hours are saddened in the shadow of that unexpected news. It is not that many of them knew him, or that they can claim the sorrowful distinction of a personal grief—they may never have seen his face, never have heard his voice, never have communicated with him in any way; but his presence, the splendid knowledge that he yet was among us and was able to recognise the homage of those to whom his work was precious, seemed to sustain a kinship of thought, a subtle communion of the spirit, which is the secret treasure of the truly great man given from the circle he has made his own. It is true that in the normal course of human affairs George Meredith could not have lived for many more years; well and happily had he exceeded the allotted span; but the end came suddenly, and the shock is the more keenly felt. That his illness did not take the form of an interminable, weariful time of pain we may be thankful; he preserved his intellectual prime to the last, and saw the efflorescence of the spring he sang so beautifully:

Out in the yellow meadows, where the bee
Hums by us with the honey of the Spring,
And showers of sweet notes from the larks on wing
Are dropping like a noon-dew, wander we—
Or is it now? or was it then? for now,
As then, the larks from running rings pour showers;
The golden foot of May is on the flowers,
And friendly shadows dance upon her brow.

To say, as has been said in numberless fugitive columns during the past week, that English literature suffers an irremediable loss with the death of this great novelist is beside the point and carries not even the saving impulse of truth. Literature, once enriched, retains her wealth for ever; one by one those fine souls who gave her of their best and purest pass away, but in the nation's memory—that unceasing and unbroken memory which bridges generation with generation and links past centuries to ages yet unborn—their words are imperishably enshrined. The inviolable condition is that sincerity of purpose must have brought these winged messengers to birth, noble aims nourished them, fine perceptions selected their arrangement and fixed the central idea from which, as beams from a star, they shall radiate and burn. Given such attributes, the inspiring genius may vary as do precious stones—sapphire and ruby, emerald and diamond, amethyst and topaz, different in degree but united in their splendour. "Nature," said Carlyle, "does not make all great men, more than all other men, in the self-same mould. . . . Many different names, in different times and places, do we give to great men; according to varieties we note in them, according to the sphere in which they have displayed themselves." An indomitable truth and fidelity to his own instincts was the prevailing characteristic of George Meredith in his chosen realm of fiction; he knew he was right, whatever the world said, and that time would eventually crown him with the hero's laurel, sign of honourable victory. "Assured of worthiness," he wrote in his sonnet entitled "Internal Harmony," "we do not dread competitors":

. . . we rather give them hail
And greeting in the lists where we may fail:
Must, if we bear an aim beyond the head!
My betters are my masters; purely fed
By their sustenance I likewise shall scale
Some rocky steps between the mount and vale;
Meanwhile the mark I have and I will wed.
So that I draw the breath of finer air,
Station is nought, nor footways laurel-strewn,
Nor rivals tightly-belted for the race.
Good speed to them! My place is here or there;
My pride is that among them I have place:
And thus I keep this instrument in tune.

In tune, to the very last, the incomparable instrument stayed, and it will be to those who loved him a happy remembrance to set against their loss that to the latest week of his life the brain was clear, the outlook unclouded, the recollection facile and scarcely dimmed.

It is difficult for the younger generation, to whom the name of Meredith is so familiar, to realise that his first work—a volume of poems—was issued in the year made notable for English letters by the publication of "Pendennis," that "Shirley" had not long been in print, that "Bleak House" had not yet appeared, and that in France Chateaubriand had only been dead for three years. The fiction of this country at that period and in the following decade was in a state of transition—we might almost say a state of chaos, but it was a chaos illumined by dazzling flashes from several quarters. "Adam Bede" was to manifest its author's strength and win for her an undying name; Tennyson was to strike the sweet-sounding bells of "In Memoriam" and send their mellow tones echoing down the age; Browning was to produce the laborious "Paracelsus." By the launching of "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel" in the year 1859, Meredith, then thirty-one, puzzled the critics and took his stand—though not as yet his ultimate position—as a novelist who refused to pander to popular taste, who wrote in a style for which there was no standard of comparison available, and whose line of progression would be evidently set severely apart from others of his kind. The reception of the new departure was not flattering. One reviewer criticised it as full of faults, wearisome, affected, didactic, a book for men only; another buried it under the obloquy of being "untrue to life." We need not concern ourselves with this sort of thing now; very possibly the aspersions of these superior literary gentlemen were perfectly sincere at the time, and it is the fate of a writer or artist who has the pluck to set up a standard of his own to be judged by men who naturally cling to the criterions to which they are accustomed; but posterity has effectually reversed their condemnation. By many readers, chiefly, we think, the more youthful among his admirers, that book is considered his best. This is neither the time nor place to enter upon any protracted discussion of Meredith as a stylist, or of his literary methods: we have recently appreciated and criticised some aspects of his work in prose and poetry in these columns; but it may be noted that not until the appearance of that masterpiece of comedy, "The Egoist," in the year 1879 did he receive anything approaching a wide approval. His curious style was essentially chosen for his personal pleasure; it had inconsequences, aberrations, discords—consecutive fifths in prose, we might term them—which only a minority even among the more literary and gifted of his readers could perceive to be deliberately and daringly introduced with an absolute disregard of public opinion. Placid enunciations of immature sentiment never found their way into the pages of this "master of us all," as R. L. Stevenson called him. The love-making of his heroes and heroines was never stupid, never gross, never fatuous, never sickeningly sweet; it abounded in the intensest passion—the demand of body for body and soul for soul—but never in the faintest degree was it soiled and degraded by eroticism in phrase or in suggestion. "Sentiment you do not obtain from a Damascus blade," he writes in "Harry Richmond," and the parallel is not inapt as applied to his own work; love, hearty, vehement, pure, he delighted to portray. What inimitable pictures we have of Richard Feverel, in the toils of love for the first time!—

His heart was a lightning steed, and bore him on and on over limitless regions bathed in superhuman beauty and strangeness, where cavaliers and ladies leaned whispering upon close green swards, and knights and ladies cast a splendour upon savage forests, and tilts and tournaments were held in golden courts lit to a glorious day by ladies' eyes, one pair of which, dimly visioned, constantly distinguishable, followed him through the boscage and dwelt upon him in the press, beaming while he bent above a hand glittering white and fragrant as the frosted blossom of a May night.

Awhile the heart would pause and flutter to a shock: he was in the act of consummating all earthly bliss by pressing his lips to the small white hand. Only to do that, and die! cried the Magnetic Youth; to fling the Jewel of Life into that one cup and drink it off! He was intoxicated by anticipation. For that he was born. There was, then, some end in existence, something to live for—to kiss a woman's hand, and die! He would leap from the couch, and rush to pen and paper to relieve his swarming sensations. Scarce was he seated when the pen was dashed aside, the paper sent flying with the exclamation, "Have I not sworn I would never write again?" Sir Austin had shut that safety valve. The nonsense that was in the youth might have poured harmlessly out, and its urgency for ebullition was so great that he was repeatedly oblivious of his oath, and found himself seated under the lamp in the act of composition before pride could speak a word. Possibly the pride even of Richard Feverel had been swamped if the act of composition were easy at such a time, and a single idea could stand clearly foremost; but myriads were demanding the first place; chaotic hosts, like ranks of stormy billows, pressed impetuously for expression, and despair of reducing them to form, quite as much as pride, to which it pleased him to refer his incapacity, threw down the powerless pen, and sent him panting to his outstretched length and another headlong career through the rosy-girdled land.

For virility of prose and clarity of construction has any succeeding writer equalled this splendid, nervous English? And the tender, half-shy impulses of Evan and Rose, in "Evan Harrington," are as simple and as delicate as any love scene in the other more famous volumes:

Then these lovers talked of distant days—compared their feelings on this and that occasion with mutual wonder and delight. Then the old hours lived anew. And—did you really think that, Evan? And—O, Rose! was that your dream? And the meaning of that bygone look: was it what they fancied? And such and such a tone of voice: would it bear the wished interpretation? Thus does Love avenge himself on the unsatisfactory past, and call out its essence.

The humour which interpenetrates all the novels is on too titanic a scale to be taken to the heart of the average reader, who prefers farce and comic bodily exigencies to emergencies of mental states that require some powers of concentration of thought for their clear apprehension. The comedy inherent in such figures as Sir Austin, even while his iron rule leads to the bitterest tragedy, eludes the popular ear. When, for instance, the immaculate baronet discovers from the "lofty watch-tower of his System" that his son has been relieving his overcharged feelings in the ancient and honourable manner of lovers, "his wounded heart had its reasons for being much disturbed":

"Surely," said Lady Blandish, "you knew he scribbled?"
 "A very different thing from writing poetry," said the baronet. "No Feveel has ever written poetry."

"I don't think it's a sign of degeneracy," the lady remarked.
 "He rhymes very prettily to me."

A London phonologist and a friendly Oxford Professor of poetry, quieted Sir Austin's fears.

This energy of satire never degenerated to rancour even in Meredith's most fierce and censorious moods. It informed his dislike of narrowness, bigotry, and Puritanism with a scathing, subtle, yet withal good-humoured disdain which was far more poignant than the bludgeons of downright didactic declamation could have been. It also led up in its more exalted expressions to the blemishes of intellectual obscurity that must be admitted here and there to exist; but be it noted that the faults are always those of depth of thought and idea, not those of shallowness—and here is the great gulf fixed between him and the crowded scribblers of the present day, who by ornate embellishment and a pedantry of decoration seek to conceal the fragility of their anæmic conceptions. He spared no weapons of scorn for the weak and false and morally frail, and it is as if at times his pen was clogged by the burden of his contempt.

As a poet, George Meredith is assured of a high place among the singers of England, but more by reason of a few exquisite poems that visibly separate from the body of his work than by reason of a large output of any exceptional poetic attraction. As we pointed out in these pages a short time ago, the very qualities of brimming idea and prolific metaphor which so astound the reader and make his prose so wonderful militate against the production of rhythmic verse. The exceptions, the undeniably great poems by which his name will live, can be briefly numbered. "Love in the Valley," with its haunting measure, represents perhaps the highest point of pure poesy that Meredith attained, and its last stanza, with its simple assertion "heaven is my need," touches the heart:

Could I find a place to be alone with heaven,
 I would speak my heart out: heaven is my need.
 Every woodland tree is flushing like the dogwood,
 Flashing like the whitebeam, swaying like the reed.
 Flushing like the dogwood crimson in October,
 Streaming like the flag-reed South-West blown;
 Flashing as in gusts the sudden-lighted whitebeam;
 All seem to know what is for heaven alone.

"Modern Love" is his greatest work, in the general acceptance of the word great; this, again, we must not enlarge upon. "Melampus," "The Lark Ascending," some portions of "A Reading of Earth," and a few other poems form the posy from this garden the fragrance of which will be immortal.

George Meredith cared for no man's praise or blame. Never once did he stoop to the petty self-advertisement that is as the breath of life to so many lesser men. The fineness of the world was in him, while from his modest retreat among the hills and woods he loved so well he followed the doings of that world and moved day by day in his circle of content. The praise or blame of men is still less to him now; it is left for us to pay our tribute of sympathy and sorrow to those bereaved, and to hold his name in affectionate remembrance as one to whom trials made life a splendid thing, buffetings were cause for brave, free laughter, and one whose motto might be well written in his own indomitable words: "Let life be torn and streaming like the flag of battle, it must be forward to the end."

"THESE THREE"

It is hardly possible to read through carefully the series of magnificent letters which the Apostle Paul sent to the Churches at Corinth, at Ephesus, at Philippi, and other recently-formed congregations of the saints, without coming to the conclusion that the writer was one of the most energetic and indomitable persons of his time. Undisguisedly he glories in the faith that is in him—the faith which checked his sinister career so suddenly and sublimely when on the dusty road to Damascus there "shined round about him a light from heaven." The "threatenings and slaughter" with which he had previously been filled are transmuted by some mysterious spiritual alchemy into an ardent desire for the conversion of men, and whereas before he brought death and disgrace to their bodies, now he strains every nerve in order that their souls may live. He exhorts, warns, reproaches—it is astonishing what a modern note occurs in some of these passages. "Now in this that I declare unto you," he says to the quarrelsome Corinthians, "I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse; for first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you; and I partly believe it. . . . What shall I say to you? Shall I praise you in this? I praise you not." With a superb egotism he declaims time after time his confidence in himself and his belief: "I therefore so run," he writes, "not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air"; and in another place, "As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia." In curious contrast comes an occasional self-distrust, as though his impetuous nature had betrayed him into saying too much—"I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me; for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing." The immeasurable joy of it all breaks through irrepressibly again and again. "Now thanks be to God," he cries, "which always causeth us to triumph. . . . We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." And this is the man who stood by, witnessing and consenting to Stephen's martyrdom; who "made havoc of the church, entering into every house, and haling men and women committed them to prison"! It is one of the most wonderful instances of the complete diversion of fiery vigour and ill purpose into a diametrically opposite channel of which we have any record.

This restless, reckless spirit, however, had its calmer interludes, and it was when under the influence of one of these brief tranquillities in the battle that some of his finest periods were penned. Faith and hope are the masts and sails of his vessel, charity—that is, love—is its precious freight, and for what splendid havens "eternal in the heavens" this prince of dreamers steered we are told with a repetition that never wearies. "We look not," he says, "at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." Here was his faith in its primal and intensest form—that belief in the journey's ultimate success and glorious end which to-day seems to many men quite impossible and untenable. Here was his hope, its divine and human aspects indivisible as the root and stem of the perfect flower; the exalted and inspiring hope which is to-day scorned by many who apparently have no need of an "anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, which entereth into that within the veil."

It would seem that the rapidity with which we live in the present age renders a certain type of mind independent of spiritual matters. An engagement for every hour of the day, be it business or pleasure, leaves little time to spare for the consideration of "things unseen." "It is a secret," wrote Emerson, "which every intelligent man quickly learns, that beyond the energy of his possessed and conscious intellect he is capable of new energy (as of an intellect doubled on itself) by abandonment to the nature of things; that besides his power as an individual man, there is a great public power upon which he can draw, by unlocking at all risks his human doors, and suffering the ethereal tides to roll and circulate through him." And if it be objected that these sentences are somewhat ornate and indeterminate, we can reasonably condense them into one assertion—that man stands in a definite relationship to the infinite. The realisation of this is not constant, like the bodily sense of touch or of sight; it comes and goes irresponsibly, born of a moment's experience, a fleeting transfiguration of the material, visible world. Even Shelley in his ardour admitted where he could not prove—in doing which, we conceive, poets rise from the sphere of the artist to that of the prophet and interpreter of mysteries:

The awful shadow of some unseen Power
Floats though unseen amongst us—visiting
This various world with an inconstant wing
As summer winds that creep from flower to flower;
Like moonbeams that behind some pine mountain shower,
It visits with inconstant glance
Each human heart and countenance;
Like hues and harmonies of evening,—
Like clouds in starlight widely spread,—
Like memory of music fled,
Like aught that for its grace may be
Dear, and yet dearer for its mystery.

The faith and hope which inform these stanzas, and those of many another poet, are directly in line with that imperturbable faith and hope of Paul, differing only in degree and in clearness of definition, and the more we realise the beauty and the simplicity and the strength of the proud apostle's words, the more heavily seems to press the question: Are we losing in these later years the spiritual sense?

In the physical realm it is common knowledge that an organ consistently neglected or unused becomes atrophied; the injured arm or leg, compelled to stillness, shrinks and wastes away. In the region of intellect the parallel holds good; the mathematician, the anatomist, the astronomer often encourages one gift at the expense of others, which gradually sink below the normal in effectiveness. Precisely so the spiritual sense, the sense by which we retain our hold on those shining dreams that have been the inspiration of prophets and priests and poets from the earliest ages, may be cultivated or discarded, enhanced or vitiated beyond all remedy. This sense is no fantasy of the imagination. It is as much and as explicit a part of our nature as the bodily sense of sight, or of hearing; indeed, between these there exists a fundamental analogy, since the spiritual sense is that function or instinct of the soul by which we are enabled to perceive—it may be but dimly—the lands that lie beyond the bounds of space and time, to hear—it may be but faintly—the voices of the infinite. The ancient mystics apprehended this subtle bond connecting the known and the unknown; the prophets of old were familiar with it—the "Vision of Isaiah" is full of suggestive passages; the Apostle Paul, as we have seen, lived to proclaim it, having become cognisant of it in no ordinary manner; and in later times many devout men—Saint Francis, notably—have illustrated in their lives its influence and perseverance. What scope do we allow it to-day?

The spectacle of a world wherein this faith, this divine elation of spirit, was permitted to descend into oblivion: where this hope, the super-vision of the soul, was dulled, and where charity, born of faith and hope, was crowded out, would be a pitiful one. Angels could hardly visit such a world. Peace must for ever shun its atmosphere of gloom. Love could scarcely enter within its borders; only passion, wearing the mask of love, could receive a welcome there. The wrangling of the market-place would be its offering of praise to the Most High; the sound of faithless, and therefore meaningless, prayers would rise only to insult the heavens; its ruinous temples and lovely, violated shrines could but mock the God whom once they honoured. No sweet spirit of pity could ever work in happy ministrations to the weak, the wounded, or to those who had fallen weary by the way; only the shades of anger and contempt and despair would move uneasily among the throng, spurning to yet more sombre depths of sorrow the souls already forsaken and forlorn. The thousand blooms of spring would put forth their pure petals and their delicate colours in vain for eyes that viewed them indifferently; the luxuriant summer would spend its fragrance and its balm for naught; autumn harvests would be garnered without joy, and through the dearth and silence of winter would shine no fore-running gleam to tell of the new birth close at hand. No strange delight would thrill its dawns, and from its sunsets the dream would be withheld; even the stars, ranging in the dusk for their nightly march across the sky, could flash no bright message to it. And at the end, when having forgotten love, and with faith and hope deflowered, its puny company travelled into eternity, one tremendous question would ring its knell of dismay—"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

It is quite in accordance with his plan that St. Paul should allot less space to the subject of hope than he does to those of faith and charity. Hope is a recurrent state of the soul for which man is irresponsible; it "springs eternal in the human breast," is born of the least things—a word, a glance, a touch, will call it into radiant being. It dies very hardly; indeed, it may be said to be imperishable while life lasts—a statement so widely admitted that it has passed into proverbial form. For if a man is absolutely destitute of hope the silver cord is loosed, the golden bowl is broken, the sun and stars are darkened; he is to all intent and purpose dead already, soul-dead, and often he will hurry his body out of existence as the last desperate measure he can take to render himself in harmony with a universe which seems to him hopeless. The life of man is one long fugue on the theme of hope, often overcome by discords apparently without resolution, often modulating into strange keys, surprising by mutinous, inexplicable phrases, sometimes faltering to a whisper of fugitive music, but always held and braced to coherence by the theme, although it may be that frequently only the skilled musician can trace that theme at all. Truly says the apostle "we are saved by hope," for lacking it, we die.

Here appears, then, the line of demarcation between hope and the other two transcendent attributes. We may live without faith, or without love; they are acts, not states; we can deliberately despoil our souls of them and still possess happiness enough to render life worth the living—a blind, starved, ghostly sort of happiness it is at best, the mere vague reflection of the sun-ray from base metal, dull and without beauty or warmth, but sufficient to save the body from destruction—not the soul. For the saving of the city of Mansoul there must be the faith which “subdued kingdoms, stopped the mouths of lions,” and the love which “suffereth long, and is kind”; for the saving of the soul, that is, in hourly freedom from evil thoughts, conceptions, and desires, the preserving it from taint of contact with things inimical to its purity, things perilous to its sacred, inborn passion for God. So sure is the apostle of this that time after time his magnificent declamations sound in our ears; he can hardly forsake this great subject of man’s correspondence with the divine through faith and love. “Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal,” he says; and with this verse he leads up to the more comprehensive exposition, where he designates for all time the place of love in this trilogy of indispensable things: “And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing; and though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.” The thought is bound to occur that few present-day experiences can in any manner approach this fervent outpouring of belief. A long way in front of St. Paul are we in art, in science, in education, in all that goes to make our secular sphere habitable and pleasant; a long way behind him in our hold on these “things unseen” which were to him so intensely real, so supremely dear, so tightly bound like three golden threads into the very texture of his life. We are proud of our accomplishments, our tenacity, our money: “charity envieth not, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up”; we drive hard bargains at every opportunity, and spread sails to every little breeze of scandal: charity “doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil”; we are irritable and nervous: charity “beareth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.” But St. Paul, gentle even in his exhortation, true for all the imperfect centuries that were to come as he was for his own “beloved,” the Corinthian citizens of that day, wrote unerringly and keenly his final summing-up of the whole matter:

For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known. And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

SIR REDVERS BULLER

Sir Redvers Buller. By LEWIS BUTLER. (Smith, Elder & Co., 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS is the life of a very remarkable man, who almost reached greatness. It is written with great devotion, as most biographies should be written, and Captain Lewis Butler carries us through his work (which is only 115 pages long) very easily, and although an enthusiast for his hero he tells the tale of his life with much discretion and reserve. Sir Redvers Buller was one of the best-known and most discussed men in the British Army—and that means in England, for the Army has roots which reach far. With his great physique and dominant personality, he was always a factor in the society in which he lived, and he early impressed the man in the ranks so vividly that he was nearly as well known in farm and cottage, especially in his own county, Devon, as he was among those of his own class. Redvers Henry Buller was the son of a Devonshire squire, M.P. for a division of the county, who owned the Manor of Downes, and was born on 7th December, 1839. His independence and forcefulness early developed themselves. He went first to Harrow, but proved too difficult for masters of the great school on the hill and was transferred to Eton. Captain Butler thinks that a difficult boy was more humanly handled at Eton in those days. Anyhow, Buller ran the usual course there until he was gazetted to the 60th Rifles. At Eton he was for a time the fag of a boy of greatest distinction, the Reverend Edmond Warre, lately Headmaster of the College. And so a career began which certainly lost nothing from its cradling and training. Downes, Eton and the 60th Rifles are a good start to any boy. The green brigade based on Winchester are the very purple of the British Army. Few regiments turn out so many good officers. In that brigade men of promise seldom miss their way. We are told that from the outset Buller proclaimed his independence, for he dined at mess the first night in his travelling suit. We are not told whether the subalterns imposed any penalty for that independence after dinner.

In India and China the early days were spent, but it seems that character did not really begin to take shape until Buller joined a battalion in Canada. There a strong man found natural interests and obstacles worthy of his steel. He became an expert woodsman and boatsman; the rudiments of his river lore had been learnt at Eton and developed themselves in Canada. He came there, too, under the command of Colonel Hawley, a very practical soldier, with the traditions of Craufurd’s Light Division (of Peninsular days) strong in him. He first offered Buller regimental advancement, an acting adjutancy. The young soldier replied, “But I don’t know anything about soldiering. I know something of woodcraft.” Hawley told him it was quite time that he should take to soldiering and that he would teach him. And so Buller became a serious soldier. Soon after he got his company the Red River Expedition took place, the first of Lord Wolseley’s successes, and here Buller’s physical strength, waterman’s skill and handiness brought him first prominently forward. He could navigate his boat better than a Canadian voyageur, and carried his men along by his vigorous personality. Wolseley recommended him for a brevet-majority, but as there had been no fighting promotion was given to his seniors.

The Ashantee Expedition of 1874 first gave him real prominence. He was Intelligence Officer to Sir Garnet Wolseley and seems to have very early mastered the folk-lore and fetishes of the wild pagans of West Africa, besides showing conspicuous gallantry. This time he was amply rewarded with a brevet-majority and a C.B. It is good to go on active service after a prolonged period of peace.

The war in South Africa—in the Transkei in 1878—found him on service again, and he raised and organised the Frontier Light Horse—a very heterogeneous collection of waifs and strays, surfboatmen, farmers, engine-room hands, and all that can be found along the coasts and inland towns of South Africa. Buller brought this corps from King William’s Town through Natal to the northern border of Zululand in time for the war which ensued in 1879. No man rendered more signal service during the Zulu war than did the hero of this book. At Inhlobana Mountain, on the eve of Sir Evelyn Wood’s brilliant victory at Kambula, he won the Victoria Cross over and over again. At and after Kambula he was hardly less prominent and at the final battle of Ulundi his services were very brilliant. The Brevet-Major who landed in the Cape early in 1878 became a Colonel and A.D.C. to Queen Victoria at the end of 1879. In 1882 the campaign against Arabi Pasha, which put Khedive Mohamed Tewfeek firmly on his throne after the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, saw Buller Chief Intelligence Officer, and two years later, at Teb and Tamai in the Suakin country, his services were pre-eminent. But perhaps Buller's finest feat of arms was the withdrawal of the desert column from Metemmeh after the death of that heroic son of Winchester, Herbert Stewart. And then followed 14 years of peace. Redvers Buller was in turn Deputy Adjutant-General, Quartermaster-General, and Adjutant-General. His powers of administration were exceptionally high. He called into existence the Army Service Corps, for the supply and transport work of the Army, and so did yeoman's service, and he greatly modernised the tactics of the Army. The mistake of Buller's life was made in 1893 when he was offered and refused the post of Commander-in-Chief of India. Had he then gone to new fields we do not think that he would have been superseded by Lord Roberts in 1900 in South Africa. He had been long enough in the office chair and it was time to be in the saddle again. In 1895 a great act of self-abnegation was practised by Sir Redvers. The time had come for H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge to retire from the post of Commander-in-Chief. The Liberal Government of the day would not give the post to Lord Wolseley, but offered it to Buller, who actually refused it. He gave evidence of a really fine spirit of chivalry and fairness. Lord Wolseley had done more to make Buller's career than any other man. He felt that Wolseley was the right man for Commander-in-Chief and so refused the great office himself. The Queen said to him, "You have refused to be Commander-in-Chief. You have made one." From Adjutant-General Buller went to Aldershot and contributed much to the development of that soldiers' school. The author alludes to manœuvres on a large scale held in 1898, where Buller discovered the qualities of Sir John (then Colonel) French as a cavalry leader. This is a little bit pathetic, for Sir Redvers discovered something else on those manœuvres (not mentioned by Captain Butler). He discovered a vastly superior tactician to himself in H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught (on that occasion at least), who was pitted against him.

Then comes the South African War of 1899 to 1902. The story of it all is very fresh on our minds. Captain Butler holds his brief strongly for his hero. But it is rather pathetic reading. His very defeats are extolled as instances of Buller's individual qualities. No one will deny the magnitude of the task with which he was confronted when he reached Capetown. His plan of campaign, approved at home, was to conduct a punitive expedition through the Orange Free State to Pretoria. But, alas! northern Natal was already invaded and Sir George White was hard held and soon was beleaguered. The whole tale of that struggle to reach Ladysmith is told at not too great length, until finally, after five attempts, Hlangwane Hill was taken and a passage effected, covered by the fire from the hill. But on the day of the first battle at Colenso Sir Redvers was implored to make Hlangwane the pivot of his attack. He declared it was on the opposite side of the river. But the Imperial Light Horse had it almost in their grasp (with the Fusilier Brigade standing unengaged not far off) when they at last had to retire from their attack. The resolution (or want of it) which decided on the abandonment of Colonel Long's guns is held up almost to admiration as one which no British general had dared to face for a hundred years, and the summing up by the German General Staff on the Colenso operations is ignored but not denied. The German Staff view was this: "That most gallant British Army of Colenso was never defeated. One man only was defeated—the General in command." All through this history of those sad days we read of a most fatherly care for the lives, and comfort even, of his men. The Army was wonderfully supplied and the medical arrangements were nearly perfect. We hear of the men going whistling back to their good food after defeat, and we hear the failure to pursue after the relief of Ladysmith (generally considered criminal) again defended so as to feed the hungry garrison. It may be said, in fact, that Buller's conduct of those operations were administratively free from fault—he only failed to beat his enemy. His over-anxiety for the lives of his men, which he evinced so often, gives some credence to a story well known. When he was chosen to command in South Africa a very gallant general who was his senior in rank offered to serve as his second in command. When pressed for his reasons he said, "Under Buller's somewhat rough exterior there beats an over-tender heart. He will never stand seeing his men killed. He will want an old friend to stiffen him up."

Many of us were surprised to see Buller sent back to the command of Aldershot when he returned from the war. But all will share the author's indignation at his summary removal from that command by a War Minister who was singularly unfortunate whenever he placed his unaccustomed hand on a point of discipline. A pedagogue makes a bad War Minister. His removal to the India Office did not find him any happier, and infinite harm was done by his publication of the Curzon-Kitchener correspondence.

The excellent taste in which "Redvers Buller" has been written should ensure it a wide publication. It will convince nobody. But then, most opinions are quite unassailable as to the question of Buller's conduct of the campaign ending in the relief of Ladysmith. One side, and probably the majority, strongly condemn it in most of its details. The other thinks, with Captain Lewis Butler, that their hero could do but little wrong. All will read with pleasure the record of his earlier triumphs.

"FAITH WITHOUT WORKS"

The Faith and Works of Christian Science. By the Writer of Confessio Medici. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.)

It is impossible to read this searching indictment of a form of fanaticism which has unfortunately obtained standing-room in our midst without a feeling of profound sadness. Emanating from the irresponsible brain of a woman who claimed to have the power to raise the dead, who presumptuously set herself on a level with the Divine, and who scribbled such a heterogeneous jumble of pseudo-metaphysical and pseudo-religious rubbish that it is charitable to suppose she was insane, this curious creed has gathered to itself many thousands of adherents, wealth, and a measure of influence which is astonishing, and while at the first glance there is a good deal of humour in the records of "healings," there is depression in the knowledge that people of education and respectability can be found willing to subscribe to the tenets of "Christian Science," and indignation at that wicked neglect on their part of mortal disease of which we find an occasional glimpse in the daily papers. The audacity of the "Scientists" is sublime, and, as the author remarks with admirable taste, "What concerns us is the parody, by Christian Science, of the Christian Faith." Its supporters deny nearly all accepted opinions and proven facts, even deriding the fundamental laws of sex:

In 1875 she (Mrs. Eddy) said: "Spirit instead of matter will be made the basis of generation. Matrimony must lose its present slippery footing and find permanence in a more spiritual adherence." In 1888 she said that marriage will come to an end when people have learned that "generation rests on no sexual basis."

One or two quotations from the text-book of this extraordinary woman will amplify the point of view assumed; but it is only fair to note that some of the "followers" refuse to go the whole way with their leader:

Bones have only the substance of thought which formed them. They are only phenomena of the mind of mortals. . . . Sickness has been fought for centuries by doctors using material remedies; but the question arises is there less sickness because of these practitioners? A vigorous "No" is the response deducible from two connate facts—the reputed longevity of the Antediluvians and the rapid multiplication and increased violence of diseases since the Flood. . . . The hosts of Æsculapius are flooding the world with diseases, because they are ignorant that the human mind and body are one. Obedience to the so-called laws of physical health has not checked sickness. . . . You say a boil is painful; but that is impossible, for matter without mind is not painful. . . . Man is indestructible and eternal. Some time it will be learned that mortal mind constructs the mortal body, and with its own materials. Hence no breakage nor dislocation can really occur. You say that accidents, injuries, and disease kill man; but this is not true. . . . A little girl, who had occasionally listened to my explanations, wounded her finger badly. She seemed not to notice it. On being questioned about it she answered ingenuously, "There is no sensation in matter."

We should like to have had three minutes alone with that little girl. And it would be interesting, in view of the above dogmas, to observe their author's behaviour immediately in front of a motor-omnibus, shall we say, charging down Piccadilly. "Outside of this Science," she says again, "all is unstable error. . . . I was only a scribe echoing the harmonies of heaven in divine metaphysics." But in another place she makes the most damaging admission that "No intellectual proficiency is requisite in the learner."

A large amount of the huge volume wherein these doctrines are expounded is composed of meaningless combinations of impressive-looking words. What can pedant or board-school boy make of this, for instance: "The divine metaphysics of Christian Science, like the method in mathematics, proves the rule by inversion. For example, there is no pain in Truth, and no truth in pain; no nerve in Mind, and no mind in nerve; no matter in Life, and no life in matter; no matter in good, and no good in matter." Or again: "Mind is substance. The earth's orbit, and the imaginary line called the Equator, are not substance. Divest yourself of the thought that there can be substance in matter, and then the movements and transitions now possible for mortal mind will be found to be equally possible for mortal body. Then being will be recognised as spiritual, and death will be obsolete." The author of the book under review has made the neat point with regard to the fascination of this sort of futility that "We all of us love a bit of philosophy." There is a certain type of temperament to which anything a trifle abstruse or factitiously obscure appeals almost irresistibly, especially when religious or mystical matters are in question.

In his opening chapter the writer reasons in a manner which may bring a smile, but which is genuine and serious withal. "There is comfort for all of us," he says, "in mathematics, more comfort than we can see at first sight. The propositions of Euclid, and the multiplication table, seem so far from any kind of religious fervour. Yet, as surely as the heavens are telling the glory of God, and the firmament showing His handiwork, so two and two, making four, and the angles at the base of an isosceles triangle, being equal, are eloquent of Him." This is an absolutely true and a perfectly defensible analogy in pursuit of his argument for simple reason. Until we reach a higher plane of development than that which we at present enjoy we must live by the steady light of common-sense, not by the inconsequent flare of wandering fires; and common-sense indicates that broken limbs are not set, cancer is not cured, wounds are not healed, by prayer and faith alone. Far be it from us to scorn the aid of—even the necessity for—prayer and faith, but the cool, clever hands of the surgeon, the keen eyes and fine diagnosis of the physician, are among those splendid "works" without which faith is dead and prayer is nullified.

Two hundred instances are given of "cures" effected by "Christian Science," and the author has spared no pains with his analysis of their rationality. We alluded to a certain humorous aspect—superficial, of course—in this list; here is one instance outside it:

The Daily Telegraph, August 31, 1907, quotes a story from a Christian Science publication of a little girl who read "Science and Health" to a lame sparrow till it flew away. . . . Miss Feilding gives a long account of a London lady who, when the curtains of a mantel-shelf caught fire, treated them by thought, while somebody else quenched them with wet cloths. . . . Mrs. Eddy herself says that she has made an apple tree blossom before its time—"brought out one apple blossom on an apple tree in January when the ground was covered with snow."

We presume the early primrose and the belated swallow are "precipitated" from some concentrated "thought" on the part of an experimentalist. Let us look at case 117 in the list itself for its touch of delightful, unconscious comicality:

117. Mr. E. "I woke up one morning with a pain so severe that it frightened me." Was put to sleep in half an hour by the reading aloud of Science and Health. Later "a most serious nervous disease which had grown no better for seven years left me entirely." Later, on a steamer, was not seasick. "I had never been sea-sick before, but when everyone around me began to be ill I was very much afraid I should be too."

Very many of the testimonies are just as worthless and vague, if not so funny. Stripped of extraneous detail by the calm examination of the indefatigable author—who wrote personally to many cases—the "cures" of serious diseases are in every example shown to be not proved. Numerous patients were illiterate; and even educated sufferers cannot define their own ailments precisely, as every doctor is aware—they perjure themselves "not wilfully, but from sheer inability to be accurate." "What is the good," says the writer pertinently, "of proclaiming that Christian Science heals diseases which get well of themselves? Time heals them. Here is a girl with a cold in her head: she is healed 'through the realisation of the omnipresence of Love.' Was there ever such an insult offered to the name of Love?"

It must not be imagined that the author is obstinately blind to the other side of the question. He admits most fairly the feasibility of Christian Science—i.e., mental treatment by suggestion (which every cheery doctor uses effectively on each visit to an impressionable patient) in hysterical cases and in some merely functional disorders; but when organic disease is present common-sense must step in:

When Christian Science says that accidents are unknown to God Common-sense answers that, anyhow, they are not unknown to us. When she says that germs exist only in mortal mind Common-sense offers to inoculate any Christian Scientist with anthrax or tetanus. . . . It comes to this, that she is an old offender. Common-sense has convicted her a dozen times, and is tired of seeing her name on the charge-list. Always she appeals against her sentence; carries her case into the High Court of Medicine, Religion, and Philosophy; conducts it herself, a most wearisome orator, before the Supreme Court of Absolute Reality. Always the decision of Common-sense is upheld, and she has to pay the costs of the appeal.

The writer acknowledges his indebtedness to Mr. Lyman Powell's more comprehensive work on the same subject, but it is pleasant to be able to say that he has carried out his own lengthy task with originality, energy and daring. His determination on the one hand not to mince matters, and on the other hand to be equitable, even when considering the dangerous and scandalous methods of treatment reported to be in use for serious afflictions, is worthy of great praise, and we recommend any reader who is curious or hesitant as to the status that "Christian Science" creeds should occupy in a normal mind to invest in this excellent book. It is a concise exposition of the state of affairs, and ought to do much good in a direction where good is sadly needed.

WILL-POWER

The Education of the Will. By T. SHARPER KNOWLSON. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

THE credulity for which our curious modern system of education is partly responsible is well illustrated by the floods of books and pamphlets dealing in psychological jargon with aspects of business, health, or conduct which pour from the Press. They sell in thousands, and the trail of the American is over them all. Their blatant catch-penny titles often proclaim their quality—"Every Man a King," "Dollars Want Me," "Have You a Strong Will?" "Success is For You," are a few taken at random, and we have had the pleasure of indicating the worthlessness of one or two of them in these columns. "I am writing this book," says the author of one of the most popular of the above manuals, "for the sole purpose of dragging you, or, rather, making you drag yourself, up from the dead level." Of course, he is doing nothing of the sort; he is putting into practice, with admirable astuteness, his knowledge of man's gullibility, and writing the book for the sole purpose of seizing the propitious moment and selling by huge editions.

We opened Mr. Sharper Knowlson's treatise with some little uncertainty as to which side of the fence the author had chosen for his position, for the title, in conjunction with his name, seemed to bear more than a hint that he had joined the crowd of charlatans whose efforts may not do much harm (since they are assuredly optimists of brilliant hue), but whose clamour engenders no small irritation. It is, therefore, pleasant to record that he steers along a fairly central and judiciously-selected line—that, while he emphasises legitimately the fact that a great deal of good can be accomplished by circumspect training of the will-power in cases where it is weak by nature or has been undermined by excess, he does not imitate the outrageous assertions of the "New Thought" fanatics. We may not all rise to such summits of self-control as Pascal, who determined to solve an intricate mathematical problem when tortured by an excruciating toothache, and of whom it is said that the pain disappeared "because his attention was concentrated upon another train of thought," but a certain degree of mental improvement is at everyone's disposal. Mr. Knowlson has arranged his ideas on the subject in a confessedly popular style, and has drawn sufficiently from the works of famous psychologists in illustrations and extracts to substantiate his conclusions and render them interesting. It does not strike us, however, that his book was particularly needed; we seem to have seen in other volumes at various times so much that is similar. The author proceeds on the well-known lines that assertion and confidence in the truth of our assertions will help us over the numberless stiles of life, whether the difficulty be insomnia, stage-fright, dipsomania, or literary sterility, and in the appendix he gives a series of formulæ to be repeated aloud in case of need which really cannot be read without laughing—a contingency, by the way, that Mr. Knowlson genially admits. The power of auto-suggestion is emphasised all through these pages. For example:

The man who feels he cannot pass a public-house without an irresistible temptation to enter and drink to excess must tell himself that he can, and proceed to walk past the place of temptation; a student who is conscious of a strong inclination to shirk an important duty, the result of which negligence will cost him dear, as he well knows, is to say he can resist the inclination, and at once proceed to perform the allotted task; a city man who tries to assure himself that grave responsibilities devolving upon him do not exist should admit they do exist and go out boldly to meet them; the ailing individual should not act as if he were ailing, and the man apparently suffering defeat should maintain the spirit of a conqueror.

This sounds very plausible, but if we have incipient influenza and face the east winds the science of self-control, or any other science save that of self-preservation, will cease to interest us in a very short time; while to maintain the spirit of a conqueror when being trodden upon is a kind of mental gymnastics possible to few. The author is in error when he states that "imagination and will can cure certain fundamental disorders," and adds that this "has been proved without a doubt"; he here confuses a "functional" with "fundamental." He is right, if not definitely useful, when he encourages all sufferers from whatever form of debility to "try, try again"; in this heartening programme of his he is so persistent that he reminds us of Miss Tox with Mrs. Dombey in his unremitting desire that his readers should "make an effort." We are afraid, however, that any attempt at "popular" psychology is bound to be abortive; the people who will read this volume and understand it are those who will hardly need to put in practice its directions; they will probably be sane, healthy, normal persons, whose powers of self-control are equal to dealing with most of life's little emergencies, and whose instincts in a mental crisis would send them to the family physician.

THE CONTROVERSY OF ZION

The City of Jerusalem. By COLONEL C. R. CONDER, LL.D., R.E. (Murray, 12s. net cash.)

THE author's family offers an example of the persistency of particular tastes in many members through several generations. The name of Conder until quite recently was best known for a highly intelligent love of travels, undertaken chiefly for the sake of art criticism or archæological research. The first of these objectives is remarkable, because the family was early associated with a rigidly Evangelical Protestantism, iconoclastic in sentiment. Fortunately for the literature of travel, the exclusion of ornament from the service of religion did not involve in the family mind any shyness in studying its secular history. It might have done so, if the earlier writers in the family could have foreseen that the cultivation of the taste for art would eventually produce so exotic a flower as the quite mundane art of its most creative son, the artist Charles Conder. Colonel Conder is too good an antiquary to allow religious conviction to interfere with the accuracy of his reports, but he shows in his historical references a family sympathy, such as is legitimate in a historian, with the masters of Jerusalem, in proportion as their successive religions were least discordant with Puritanic sentiment. He shows this sentiment quite plainly, though not at all offensively, and it is curious that so much of his energy should have been spent on researches in a city almost as much transformed by the triumphs of one standard of taste in religious art over another, as by the ravages of time and war.

Colonel Conder tells us in his brief preface that he has set himself a task, which surely no one could perform. He attempts to epitomise in some three hundred pages the topographical history of a city constantly inhabited for forty centuries, in accordance with the results of recent investigations, which have themselves created quite a large body of literature. To this he has, of course, contributed personal and often perilous exploration and a large number of learned writings. It must be remembered that some twenty antagonistic races have ruled in Jerusalem, ranging from Hittites and Jebusites of the age of Melchisedeck to Ottoman Turks of the present day, and have adapted its natural conditions to their peculiar requirements. It will not then be surprising if Colonel Conder writes quite appropriately of "precipices traceable, in places"; and of Sir Charles Warren as having "discovered" an ancient valley, in an inhabited city. Accumulations of rubbish which have raised the natural surface forty, eighty or ninety feet do not need special remark, they are so common, and much Herodian masonry has completely disappeared, which remains in other parts of the city show, must have been of gigantic proportions and construction. The site of Jerusalem seems to have fulfilled the prophecy: "Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low." If Colonel Conder had a much stronger faculty than he actually possesses, for presenting buried topography to the eye in words, it would be impossible for him to give a succession of clear ideas of Jerusalem, on account of its complete and frequent transformations. The only way to obtain such ideas would be to stand with him on the spot, and refer to a series of double maps drawn according to the discoveries which he has assisted in making. The value and interest of this book lies rather in Colonel Conder's descriptions of particular constructions, and in his historical allusions. He wastes little space in circumlocution, and consequently manages to include a great amount of interesting matter, which can only be noticed here and there.

The inquisitive reader cannot entirely dispense with the learned and expensive books mentioned by Colonel Conder and included in his bibliography, nor indeed with the author's own previous works, for he sometimes forgets to explain himself sufficiently. When he quotes several letters from the Amorite King of Jerusalem to the Pharaoh of his period (the fifteenth century before Christ), derived from the Tell Amarna Tablets, the inquisitive reader expects to learn more about the provenance of the tablets themselves, since Colonel Conder has written a book on them; but he is disappointed. It is a satisfaction to light on any traditions established by exploration, and the imaginative reader will be glad that the traditional site of the Holy of Holies, accepted by Jews, Christians and Moslems alike, is corroborated. The Sakhras rock has been identified with the "Stone of Foundation" still visible in the time of Herod within the Holy of Holies, and with the lapis pertusus, described by the Bordeaux Pilgrim of the fourth Christian century as the place where the Jews of his period were accustomed to wail over the departed glories of their race. The rock is pierced by a shaft communicating with a cave below, which has every sign of having been excavated for a granary in connection with a threshing floor, in fact with "the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite." In the same chapter, "On the Hebrew Kings," Colonel Conder describes the tunnel of the earlier Pool of Siloam (another place familiar to readers of the Bible), which was excavated during the reign of Hezekiah. Colonel Conder himself explored the tunnel, and was the first to take an impression of the celebrated inscription on its walls. Of this he gives a reproduction. In the chapter "On Ezra and Nehemiah" he gives one admirable clue to the puzzling question of topography, pointing out that the main streets of the city are identical in direction, certainly since the rebuilding of the city by Hadrian in 135 A.D., and probably since its rebuilding by Nehemiah in 433 B.C. This would be a great help to the elucidation of the six plans, of different periods, which Colonel Conder provides, if they could only be placed one above the other.

In noticing, concerning the Greek Age, how early Greek ideas and Greek architecture dominated even Hebrew priests, he is characteristically careful to reiterate a previous warning, remarking that Hyrcanus, like Solomon before him, broke the Mosaic law by representing lions in his palace; for he considers that such adornment "in all times, was the sure sign of superstition creeping in." He, of course, notices the coinage of Simon Maccabaeus, one of the rare remains of this period, but he does not express the disapproval, which might be expected from him, of the sacerdotal monarchy established by the Maccabees. He chronicles without reserve the fact that very few of those patriots escaped assassination by their own countrymen, which alone discounts the accuracy of Tacitus's single sentence in praise of the Jewish race: "Among themselves there is an unalterable fidelity and kindness always ready at hand." In fact, Colonel Conder shows no disposition to conceal the savagery and treachery which characterise the race side by side with the most heroic virtues. He again shows his historical sense, in recognising duly the administrative ability of Herod the Great, and his benefactions to the city by the grandeur and extent of his building operations. His description of the magnificent masonry, composed of dressed stones twenty feet long and in some courses six feet high, still to be seen in the great outer wall of the Haram enclosure and in "David's Tower," gives a good idea of the magnitude of Herod's works. An illustration of the different methods of building to be found in Palestine is a useful addition to this and similar descriptions.

In writing of the Gospel sites, Colonel Conder cannot resist making the now familiar observation concerning the early Christians' absorption in spiritual ideas (or, in other words, in Evangelical Protestantism), and their consequent disregard of the scenes and accompaniments of Christ's life. "The first Christians," he says, "turned their eyes up to heaven, not down to the earth. They thought of the return of their Master, not of the Way of Sorrow, the Place of the Skull, or the empty tomb." Colonel Conder writes with his usual moderation, but such observations are made to point to the supposed superiority of the many and various "pure" forms of Christianity over those forms which such writers term "superstitious." With this view always before them, they miss the significance of facts. Persons who valued so highly objects which had merely touched the body of Paul, and the mere shadow cast by Peter, are wholly unlikely to have disregarded places and objects closely associated with the Body of Christ Himself. Moreover, they believed that such curative power, spiritual and physical, as was exercised through such apostolic objects, was also exercised by reason of the descent of the Holy Ghost through the whole body of the faithful collectively, and in many cases individually. They also realised that the local importance of the events which took place in Jerusalem was merged in their universal importance. Otherwise the local church of Jerusalem would have remained to die on those sites, rather than have carried with it to Pella the powers with which it was itself endowed. In this connection the "transference of the Holy Places" by Popes, to which Colonel Conder merely alludes, is made a cause of reproach by other writers, as if they supposed that the power "to remove mountains" resided entirely in the mountains themselves.

One common error may be mentioned, which can only be regarded as a slip of the pen of so learned a writer as Colonel Conder. James the Great is, of course, the son of Zebedee, beheaded by Herod Agrippa in the year 44, and not James the "brother of Jesus who was called Christ," martyred in the year 62, who should be called "James the Less" in Colonel Conder's allusion to his martyrdom. A more serious mistake is in a note on page 210, in which Colonel Conder states directly: "Cyril [of Jerusalem] was a semi-Arian." The early semi-arianism of Cyril is exceedingly doubtful, his later orthodoxy is certain.

Colonel Conder's testimony must be noticed on a much-debated question of authority: the credibility of Josephus. He entirely acquits him of any deliberate misrepresentation of facts in order to flatter the Romans, and after a very careful examination of the sites which he describes, pronounces him to have been honest and well informed. The custom of the following period, that between the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus and its rebuilding by Hadrian, for Jews and Hebrew Christians to take their dead to be interred at or near Jerusalem, suggests the origin of later pilgrimages. A supposed road to the Cross was traced still later, when Christians had no longer to follow their own via dolorosa to their own calvaries. Colonel Conder gives full credit to the sincerity of Macarius, the Bishop of Jerusalem who discovered the Holy Sepulchre which is still venerated, though he denies its genuineness. He is very likely quite sound in his objections, but he does not sufficiently explain the necessity of one of the grounds for his conclusion, namely, why the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea must have been of Greco-Hebrew construction, and could not have been of Romano-Hebrew. His later chapters dealing with the city under Byzantines, Persians, Arabs, Turks and Latins are equally interesting with those concerning Scriptural history and the early period of the Christian Church, but they cover periods and events less familiar to the majority of general readers. One of the chapters, that on the Latin Kingdom, should entice to the study of Colonel Conder's book upon the subject.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Tears of Desire. By CORALIE STANTON and HEATH HOSKEN. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

THE novels of these two indefatigable collaborators are nothing if not exciting—exciting, we would interpolate, to those who possess a taste for this particular class of fiction. Given two beautiful women living together, who are cousins bearing the same Christian and surnames, and a man in love with one of them who has not declared his passion, and possibilities begin to dawn. The man is abroad; he writes beseeching Eleanor Challis to come out and marry him at once; Eleanor Challis—the wrong one—wires accepting—and there you are! The scene of meeting at Naples, the despair and silence of the man, the arrival of the other Eleanor (with her flaming hair and baleful eyes and wicked fascinations, bien entendu) to complicate matters, the marriage, and the "situations," which fly to the pen of the popular novelist—all are here, and the tangle proceeds to tighten and then to unravel in the time-honoured way. Frankly, it is impossible seriously to criticise this sort of story. The errors are the usual ones of stereotyped phrases, some bad spelling—"omniverous" and "assinine"; twelve lines on page 70 are repeated word for word on page 120, and so on. The strong, clean-shaven face is here; sudden pallors, smothered cries, fierce hungers, scorching breaths, trembling hands, and damp foreheads sprinkle the pages as per the regulations. But we can in fairness say that in execution and plot the book is an improvement on the last one from the same authors that we noticed in these columns.

Davina. By FRANCES G. BURMESTER. (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.)

THE most accustomed novel-reader will hardly care to be interrupted in the perusal of this excellent story, but the thought will perhaps occur to him or her, as it does in some stage-plays, how much misery and desperate complication would have been avoided had two or three of the characters met for five minutes' straight talking in the shadow of a critical impasse. However, the book has to be written, so that solution of the ghostly difficulties would never do, and, of course, it does occur in real life that for want of a word in season happiness is marred for years, so we must register our remark as a mere comment and not as a grumble. For as a matter of fact the story of queer Davina, half school-girl, half woman, is cleverly told, and, although other people have more to do with the actual motion of the plot, she appears time after time with her pungent aspersions on affairs in general, and we find ourselves liking her at the last. In the beginning, it must be admitted, her queerness was against our appreciation of her fine character. The study of Bertha, the woman whom Joe Lawson marries under the impression that he has caused her deafness by an accidental blow, is acute, and the account of the deceptions which mutually ensue forms by far the most important portion of the tale. We cannot spare space to outline the theme, but will simply add that we do not think our readers will be disappointed with Miss Burmester's latest novel.

Elisabeth Davenay. By CLAIRE DE PRATZ. (Mills and Boon, 6s.)

THE character of Elisabeth Davenay is not one which will make a very strong appeal to a large circle of readers. She was as much English as she was French, and a woman of "advanced" ideas with regard to her compatriots' position in the scheme of civilisation; it must be recorded, however, to her credit, that she would never have joined the purple and green alliance had she lived in this country, nor would she have considered the féministe cause aided by the distribution of handbills from rockets, the blowing of trumpets, the annoyance of legislators, or other farcical demonstrations of irresponsibility. Her method was far wiser. She kept her attractiveness, her womanliness, her fascination; she dressed well, talked well, found favour in the eyes of men, and allowed them to visit her rooms and argue point by point the situation, with no ulterior motive. So, making many friends and a few enemies, she had no dreams of love, she set passions, home, and all the possibilities of maternity willfully beyond her horizon, and went straight ahead in her career until the call of politics became so urgent that she had to resign her professorship of English at the Lycée and assist in the launching of a paper devoted to the emancipation of women. Then, of course, comes love, and the discovery that, after all, she is but as others of her sex, importunate for the wonder of life when her soul descried its mate, tranquil, "the world forgetting, by the world forgot," when her lover's arms are round her. The clash of her ideals with the reality shocks her into a state bordering on despair. The finish of the struggle is an unnatural one. We quote from her farewell letter to André Nortier, the man who has won her heart:

Therefore I renounce love, dear one, and though I cannot be sure that I shall always care for you thus I am at least sure that no other human love can now enter my heart. I have given to you the entirety of my emotions, but I must work out my life-problems alone. If I linked my future with yours I should hinder you too, as you would hinder me . . . because love would mean more to us both than action. I go to work for my sisters in England; you, too, must work here for the freeing of your fellow-men. We shall both be serving the same great ideal, for nations have no barriers when all men love the cult of humanity. Good-bye, dear love, make those around you happy, and live your own life as far as it lies in your power. . . .

Thus we are left with no final solution to this problem, and the curtain falls while yet the play is proceeding. It seems as though the author shirked a little the wrenching of Elisabeth from the ardent pursuit of freedom, or else that she tacitly acknowledges that there is no satisfactory way out when this difficulty presents itself but that of surrender to the claims of love and motherhood. For, clearly, Elisabeth is unhappy, and, having once seen the heavens opened, her work will not fill every need of her life.

In spite of lengthy dialogues introduced from time to time in scenes which bear more than a suspicion of having been "arranged" in order that certain characters may air their views, the story is not dull, nor does it strike us as having been written in deliberate advocacy of the féministe cause. If it has been so intended, the ending stultifies it, for few girls will care to emulate Elisabeth's Spartan code of philosophy. As a study of Parisian life among these enthusiastic souls, and as an exposition of their points of view, the whole book is admirable, and it accomplishes the delicate task of being outspoken on matters of sex without ever transgressing the boundary of good taste. Elisabeth and her experiences, being the pivot of the whole movement, naturally monopolise considerable attention, but the motives and ideas of her friends give them individuality and are successful in holding the interest when the reader might feel inclined to be a trifle impatient with the heroine and her theories. The book is very fine in its character-study of the girl, and is distinctly one to be read by thoughtful persons; one, also, which will possibly enlighten them on some exigent questions.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

ABSTRACT OF THE PROCEEDINGS, MAY 11TH, 1909.

PROFESSOR E. A. MINCHIN, M.A., Vice-President, in the Chair.

Mr. R. H. Burne, M.A., F.Z.S., exhibited a series of specimens, from the Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, of adaptive structures for the respiration of air in some Aquatic Invertebrates and tropical Freshwater Fishes.

Mr. R. J. Pocock, F.L.S., F.Z.S., the Superintendent of the Gardens, exhibited the skin of a monkey representing a new subspecies of Cercopithecus, brought by Captain Boyd Alexander, F.Z.S., from Lake Chad. This he proposed to name C. tantalus alexandri, separating it from the typical C. tantalus from Nigeria because the whiskers were very long and almost wholly white, a character in which it approached the Abyssinian species C. aethiops.

Mr. W. F. H. Rosenberg, F.Z.S., exhibited a rook in which the upper mandible had overgrown the lower to a remarkable extent. This abnormality was evidently caused by an injury to the tip of the lower mandible having deprived the upper one of the opposing surface necessary to check its growth.

Professor William Ridgeway, M.A., read the following papers, communicated by the Secretary, entitled: (a) "On hitherto unrecorded Specimens of Equus quagga"; (b) "Differentiation of the Three Species of Zebras"; (c) "On a Portion of a Fossil Jaw of one of the Equidae"; and illustrated his remarks with a series of lantern-slides.

Mr. R. Lydekker described a female deer skin obtained by Captain Malcolm McNeil from Sze-chuen, which he regarded as representing a race of the Hangul distinguished by its very pale colouring; for this the name Cervus cashmirianus macneili was suggested.

Mr. E. C. Chubb, F.Z.S., presented a paper on "The Batrachians and Reptiles of Matabeleland," based upon specimens in the Rhodesia Museum, Bulawayo.

The next meeting of the Society for scientific business will be held on Tuesday, May 25th, 1909, at half-past eight o'clock p.m., when the following communications will be made:

1. Dr. J. G. De Man.—Description of a new Species of the Genus Alpheus Fabr. from the Bay of Batavia.
2. R. Lydekker.—On the Skull of a Black Bear from Eastern Tibet, with a Note on the Formosan Bear.
3. R. H. Burne, M.A., F.Z.S.—The Anatomy of the Olfactory Organ of Teleostean Fishes.

The following communication has been received:

G. C. Shortridge.—An Account of the Geographical Distribution of the Marsupials and Monotremes of South-west Australia, having special reference to the specimens collected during the Balston Expedition of 1904-1907.

ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL SOCIETY.

The first of the afternoon meetings of this Society for the present session was held at 70 Victoria Street, Westminster, on Wednesday, the 19th, Mr. H. Mellish, President, in the Chair.

Colonel H. E. Rawson read a paper on "The Anticyclonic Belt of the Northern Hemisphere." In a previous communication the author brought forward some facts regarding the anticyclonic belt of the southern hemisphere, derived from an examination of the South African records from the year 1841 to 1906. He found that the indications of a cyclical oscillation of the belt to and from the equator over South Africa were strong enough to encourage the belief that an analysis of Australian records on the one side and of Argentine on the other would prove that all the action centres of the atmosphere were moving together over this wide area, and that a similar oscillation existed in the northern hemisphere. Colonel Rawson subsequently found that investigations of Mr. H. C. Russell and Dr. J. W. S. Lockyer supported his conclusion that there is a period of about 95 years between the greatest north and greatest south position of the anticyclonic belt in the southern hemisphere, the double oscillation thus taking nineteen years. He has since extended the enquiry into the movements of the action-centres in the northern hemisphere with a view to ascertaining whether they show any similar oscillation to and from the equator, which is not to be explained by seasonal changes of position. Dealing with the Nile floods, he draws the inference that the high pressure systems which affect North-East Africa are farther north when the floods are in excess, and nearer to Egypt when they are deficient. He also made an analysis of the tracks of the hurricanes which passed north and south of Manila Observatory, and found that these throw an interesting light upon the oscillations of the action-centres of the atmosphere.

A paper by Mr. A. Walter, of the Royal Alfred Observatory, Mauritius, on "Errors of Estimation in Thermometric Observations" was read by the Secretary. In examining the returns from a newly inaugurated series of second-order meteorological stations in Mauritius it was noticed that a large percentage of the thermometer readings were in whole or half divisions. This led the author to analyse the returns, and he gave in the paper the frequency curves of the "tenths of estimation."

CORRESPONDENCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

"ALL GIFTS ARE NOT GIVEN TO ONE."

—Macaulay.

DEAR SIR,—I beg to be allowed, through your columns, to convey to your correspondent, "F.," my grateful acknowledgments for his kind and flattering appreciation of my literary efforts. I prize his remarks much, firstly, because of the sincerity which runs through them; and secondly, because I consider them as one of the most pleasing rewards that I ever received for my long and unremitting labour.

But now, discarding my personality, I must repeat more precisely that, if most critics admire (a) Racine when he says of the rising sun :

"L'astre dont la présence écarte la nuit sombre," etc.,

(b) de Vigny, when he imparts his impression at the sight of the sun at sea :

"Le soleil souriant dorait les voiles blanches," etc.,

(c) Leconte de Lisle, when he draws a picture of the dawn of day :

"L'aube aux flancs noirs des monts marchait d'un pied vermeil," etc., not one in twenty critics will ever feel disposed to recommend the following poetical prose :

"L'aurore ouvrait avec ses doigts de rose les portes de l'orient," as a substitute for the simple sentence :

"Le soleil se levait."

And if a good many critics admire (a) Victor Hugo, when, speaking of Nature after sunset, he says :

"Le rayon du couchant laisse un adieu plus doux," etc.,

(b) Sully Prudhomme, when, in speaking of evening twilight, he expresses himself thus :

"Le crépuscule aux fleurs mêlait ses améthystes," etc.,

(c) Maurice Bouchor, when he paints so gracefully the effects of the setting sun on Nature :

"Lorsque sur le soleil majestueux et las
La porte d'or du riche Occident s'était close,
Tel qu'un hortensia fleurissait le ciel rose,
Nuancé de vert pâle et teinté de lilas," etc.

very few will appreciate this too flowery sentence in prose :

"Le soleil couchant tendait sur l'horizon une bande d'un rose tendre, qui flottait comme une écharpe aux doux balancements des flots"; to which many will certainly prefer the following expression, so simple and so natural :

"Le soleil se couchait."*

I compare the former to the gaudy costume of the toreador and the latter to the sober dress of the gentleman in the true acceptance of the word.

Referring to Hazlitt, I beg to state that my critic must have read this author's "Lectures on the English Poets" a long time ago, since he seems to have forgotten that this very writer gives to the word "poetry" a score of queer and original definitions, amongst which I will choose two: beauty and interest. When he says, for instance, that there is poetry in "Robinson Crusoe" he very likely alludes to the beauty which really exists in Defoe's unpretentious style; and when he speaks of the poetry which is to be found in the childish game of "Hide-and-Seek" he no doubt means that there is great interest in that game. And there is, as far as I remember, in one of the first twenty or thirty pages of his volume of "Lectures on the English Poets" a footnote written either by Hazlitt himself or by his editor, which runs as follows :

Poets are in general bad prose-writers, because their images, though fine in themselves, are not to the purpose, and do not carry on the argument.

In connection with Flaubert's opinion of poetry I beg to say that, however great may be my admiration for verse, I do not consider it as "the absolute and best expression of human thought." Simple, clear, and elegant prose, like that of About, for instance, conveys one's thoughts more clearly and more concisely than French poetry will ever be able to do, on account of its rhymes, which cause the ideas sometimes to take a different path from the one that the poet originally assigned to them in his mind before he set his pen to paper.

Regarding the "illustrious Flaubert," as my critic calls the author of "Madame Bovary," I am in a position to say that I do not share "F.'s" great admiration for this writer. I cannot bring my mind to consider Flaubert as "illustrious," for the following reason: The difference which I find between the loose style of his letters and the concise one which he displays in his novels leads me to believe that his reputation has been greatly over-rated. Do what I will I cannot expel from my mind the idea that his best works were submitted for correction to some clever brother writer or critic before he had them printed, because the difference between the two is immense; his letters do not rank above those of Ponsou du Terrail, whilst his novels can be put on a par with the best productions in French literature. "La langue de ses lettres," says Emile Faguet, "est copieuse, abandonnée, négligée jusqu'à une affectation de négligence et de trivialité, décousue, surchargée, violente, emphatique et débridée. Celle de ses romans, est châtiée, surveillée, calculée. On peut dire avec assurance que littéralement tout y a été corrigé, tout raturé et écrit à nouveau. Sa correspondance fourmille de fautes de français, et, pour ce qui est du style proprement dit, est souvent défectueuse jusqu'à en être choquante, etc. Comme peintre de portraits (dans ses romans), il est supérieur à Balzac. Ses paysages sont des hallucinations précises. Depuis Chateaubriand, on n'avait pas su peindre les choses de la nature avec cette prodigieuse netteté, cette extraordinaire adaptation de l'expression à l'objet."

Let us now take Flaubert as a critic. My humble opinion is that he used to judge of literary productions with a biased mind. For instance, what confidence can anyone place in a critic who says :

"La fable des 'Deux Pigeons' m'a toujours plus ému que tout Lamartine?"

This sweeping judgment is quite as bad as Lamartine's criticism on Lafontaine's masterpieces :

"Douze vers sonores, sublimes, religieux d'Athalie, m'effaçaient de l'oreille toutes les cigales, tous les corbeaux et tous les renards de cette ménagerie puérile."

But to be fair both to my critic "F." and to Flaubert I will quote a passage from one of this French author's novels, so charming in its elegant simplicity, so true in its faithful picture of home-life amongst the working classes. His hero has come back home from work at night to meet his wife and child, whom he finds asleep. He walks on tiptoe in order not to wake either, and his affectionate look goes from one to the other; then he stops in front of his little girl's cradle and begins to think of her future :

"Charles les regardait. Il croyait entendre l'haleine légère de son enfant. Elle allait grandir maintenant; chaque saison, vite, amènerait un progrès. Il la voyait déjà revenant de l'école à la tombée du jour, toute riieuse, avec sa brassière tachée d'encre et portant au bras son panier; puis il faudrait la mettre en pension; cela coûterait beaucoup; comment faire? Alors il réfléchissait," etc.

A FRENCH LINGUIST.

POETS' PROSE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The discussion raised by your essayist's remark about the prose of verse-writers is peculiarly interesting and important. The real point seems to be precisely as expressed in your article, viz., "a man who can write really good poetry can also write good prose"; rather than the one which your correspondent, "A French Linguist," appeared to be discussing, whether a man can be both a great poet and a great prose-writer. To this question, which is very different from the other, your correspondent's negative may perhaps be allowed, for its discussion would turn largely upon individual differences, such as whether Milton can be considered as great both in verse and in prose.

But to my mind there can be no doubt that there is something in the nature of genuine poetry and of the genuine poet which brings it to pass that he instinctively and inevitably writes fine prose; and this in spite of the vital differences between the two media both in structure and inspiration. One might almost say that here is a method of detecting a spurious poet: if he writes bad prose he has not the immortal flame. It might be possible to argue that there is a peculiar character about this prose which makes it distinctively "poets' prose"; there is, for example, a singular harmony between the verse and the prose of Wordsworth and of Gray respectively. The same may be said of the writings of that last of the Titans, whose loss is still fresh and sore, the late Mr. Swinburne. But the main proposition holds good.

It is notable that the converse is by no means true: a great proseur is not of necessity a good poet. Writers so diverse as Lamb and Ruskin may be cited where many examples might be given; whilst as for some consummate masters, like De Quincey and Pater, I do not know that they wrote verse at all.

There is much cogency in "A French Linguist's" argument that a man who attempts to use both media of language is apt to spoil himself for both, or at least to fall short of greatness in either. The names of Charles Kingsley and Alexander Smith might have been sure of a richer immortality than can be theirs had they developed one medium exclusively. On the other hand, it may be that these writers and their like accomplished just such work as they were capable of, and that exclusive devotion to any one muse might not have brought the crowning compensation.

One more point remains, which was raised by your second correspondent, "F.," who cites Flaubert's opinion of poetry as the supreme and absolute expression of human thought. Without disputing the thesis I always find something a little invidious in this comparison of prose and poetry. Surely it is better to say that both are high and noble voices; but their tone and effect is different as they themselves are different. They are the voice of speech and the voice of song; the voice of song has a wider compass and is more fit to express strong feeling, "the depth and not the tumult of the soul"; the voice of speech is cunning or powerful to persuade the intellect. Each in its own way beguiles the ear; there is, as everyone knows, a rhythm of prose and a rhythm of poesy, as different the one from the other as walking is from running, and the one as beautiful and as noble as the other. Should we not therefore speak of these voices, which have each its separate strength and charm, as of equal in honour, co-ordinate in dual sovereignty?

MALARIA AND GREEK HISTORY.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I thank the reviewer of "Malaria and Greek History" for his very courteous letter. Let me say that the second paragraph of my reply did not in any way apply to him. But I am constantly receiving criticisms to the effect that the Greeks did not deteriorate in the fourth century B.C., or that there is no proof that malaria caused the decline. I would reply that, even though this be true, malaria is an important factor for the historian to consider. Many habits of the Greeks were due to the desire to counteract the influence of an unhealthy environment, and it can be proved to demonstration that malaria caused the desertion of fertile tracts of country, brought premature old age, and gradually killed off the fair-haired portion of the population.

An article bearing upon the question of immunity to malaria has just appeared in "Janus," an international journal of medical history and geography, and I should be very grateful if you could publish a short analysis of it. The writer, Dr. Otto Efertz, a governmental vaccinator in Mexico, attempts to prove that the virulence of an infectious disease is not absolute, but relative, being the resultant of two factors varying according to the country in which the disease is endemic and the people who are attacked by it. These factors are:—(1) The virulence of the microbe, which differs in different countries; (2) the extent to which the patients have become immune through natural selection. In other words, the microbes, as the result of their struggle with men, gradually increase in strength; natural selection evolves more powerful micro-organisms. On the other hand, a race of men is evolved more capable of resisting them. The resultant represents the malignity of the disease, and it will vary as the factors vary. Dr. Efertz then notices two remarkable facts: (1) African malaria is deadly for Europeans, but very mild for Africans; (2) American malaria is deadly for American Indians, but mild for Europeans. He infers (a) that the African parasite has grown more virulent during the thousands of years it has been in Africa; (b) that the American parasite is much less virulent, having been recently carried to America. The African negro has won his battle; the European has partly won it; the American Indian has yet to win it. The European is superior to the American parasite, but inferior to the African parasite. The Indian is inferior, the African negro superior, to both.

Dr. Efertz applies similar reasoning to syphilis and yellow fever. He shows that the Spaniards could not have carried out their conquests if the continent had been as fever-stricken as it is now, and, as a matter of fact, history tells us little about fever in those days. Malaria was probably brought over from Europe; it now kills over 50 per cent. of all Mexican Indians. America, by way of return, gave syphilis to Europe. I offer no comment.

I am, Sir,

Cambridge.

Yours faithfully,

W. H. S. JONES.

OLD FRIENDS OF MR. LE QUEUX.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In a recent issue of THE ACADEMY, one of your correspondents challenged a statement wherein Mr. William Le Queux claimed to have been an "old friend" of the late Wilkie Collins. The distinguished author of "The Woman in White" died in 1889, at the age of 65. A glance at the autobiography of Mr. Le Queux as published in "Who's Who" will show, on a comparison of dates, that the claim of old friendship is obviously absurd. But it is, perhaps, illusive to take Mr. Le Queux quite as seriously as he seems inclined to take himself. The statement to which your correspondent called attention appeared in "Printers' Pie" of 1908. In the issue of that weird miscellany for 1909 Mr. Le Queux claims yet another "old friend." Mr. Le Queux seems to be what, on the Stock Exchange, they would call "a bear of Old Friends." The "old friend" is, on this occasion, a mere bank manager. But had he been a king he could scarcely have entrusted the worthy Le Queux with a more weighty mission. This is the manner of the writer's opening:

"One morning, a couple of years ago, on presenting an order to the manager of a well-known bank in the Strand—who happened to be an old friend of mine—I received from him the most magnificent string of pearls that I have ever seen. Consisting of three hundred and eighty perfectly-matched pearls of great size, it was the historic string which had belonged to Catherine the Great, and had been given by Napoleon to Josephine. It was a royal heirloom which I had been asked to take to Rome, its value being about forty thousand pounds."

That which follows is mere "shocker" undisguised and unashamed. It can have no interest for readers of THE ACADEMY except in so far as it suggests an interesting psychological problem. The problem is this: May not the continuous production of "mystery stories" superinduce a mental condition in which the patient finds it impossible to discriminate between fact and fiction?

Apart from psychology, however, one is delighted to welcome another "old friend" of Mr. William Le Queux.

Yours truly,

O. K.

THE BUDGET AND THE JEWS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In your issue of this week a letter appears in which the writer very opportunely points out the likelihood of Tariff Reform being utilised by certain persons for the purpose of protecting those industries from which Englishmen have been ousted. It is well that Englishmen should know that the leading spirits in the anti-sweating movement are pro-alien to a man—I might say to a woman. If these people were sincere they would attack the root of the evil—viz., the importation into this country of poverty-stricken aliens. This, however, is not their idea at all. Their motto is protection of sweated industries, with free importation of the human material, without which sweating would be difficult, if not impossible. You will find little desire on their part to protect any industry which is still a source of employment for Englishmen. In that direction they are all Free Traders.

Those who have looked well into this question are convinced that no scheme of Tariff Reform can assist the British worker unless it is accompanied by an Alien Exclusion Act. High prices and no better assurance of employment will be of no use to the British worker, but render his last state worse than his first.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Perhaps it is worth while to point out that in last week's issue the writer of the article entitled "The Sense of Humour" quotes some fifty lines from Mr. Augustine Birrell's essay on George Borrow, but inadvertently attributes them to Mr. Andrew Lang. They may be found in the former author's book, "Res Judicatae," at page 123.

"DODGE."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I don't think it possible to connect the word "dodge" with the French "douer." According to the "English Dialect Dictionary" a northern variant of dodge is dadge. On the other hand, the English equivalent to a French douger would be dudge; compare the French souple, souffrir, tourette, courant, couteles, mouton, glouton, bouton with their English equivalents. If dodge had been of French origin the French verb would have been doger not douger; compare our lodge with the French loger. It would be difficult to find any example of an English short o representing a French ou; the word cover is not an exception, as the accented vowel is pronounced as the u in button, the o being written before the v (or u) simply from graphic considerations.

There is no doubt that the word doué in Cotgrave, said to mean "small, fine, little, slender, thin," is derived from the Latin adjective delicatus, which in Ducange is glossed "subtilis tenuis." The O.F. forms were doué, deugé, deigé, deigé. For the last form see Chanson de Roland 3389, "l'herbe . . . verte et deigée" (l'herbe verte et fine). I am afraid the origin of the word "dodge" remains a mystery.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio
Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Str,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
sgd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

THE COUNTY COASTS SERIES.

Vol. 1. The Norfolk and Suffolk Coast

By W. A. DUTT. With about 40 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

In "The Norfolk and Suffolk Coast" the author deals with the history and romance of coast life, telling true tales of famous shipwrecks, deeds of life-saving, smuggling adventures, and landings and defeats of foreign foes. Making a peregrination of the coast from Landguard Fort to the border of Lincolnshire, he describes the towns and villages, the life and means of livelihood of the fisherfolk, the changes the coast has undergone in consequence of the gaining or retreating of the sea, the striking natural features of the coastline, and the wild life of the creeks, bays, estuaries, cliffs, beaches, and salt marshes. Places and objects of archaeological interest, such as prehistoric and Roman camps, castles, monasteries, and noteworthy churches and old houses, are also described, and literary and other associations are not neglected. Decayed or vanished towns or seaports, such as Orford, Dunwich, Cley and Blakeney, are specially noticed, and something is said about the lives and adventures of Cavendish, Shovel, Vancouver, and other famous Norfolk and Suffolk admirals and navigators.

T. FISHER UNWIN

THE "CHATS" SERIES. New Volume.

Chats on English Earthenware

By ARTHUR HAYDEN, Author of "Chats on English China," "Chats on Old Prints." With a Coloured Frontispiece and 80 full-page Plates. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net. A Companion Volume to "Chats on English China."

Old English earthenware is now as much collected as is English china. It has its band of votaries who are prepared, as the records of the auction room show, to give almost as high prices for rare examples as were given for china ten years ago.

This practical guide deals with the rise and progress of earthenware in England. The illustrations include typical examples of Delft ware of Lambeth, Bristol, and Liverpool, the rare and beautiful productions of John Dwight, M.A. of Oxford and Master-potter of Fulham, the red ware of the mysterious Dutchmen the Brothers Elers, the much esteemed salt-glazed ware, Whieldon, Wedgwood, Leeds, Swansea, old Staffordshire figures and Toby jugs, old blue printed ware, Lustre ware, and late Staffordshire ware, including Mason's Ironstone and the middle Victorian potters.

A Chapter for Beginners explains in simple language the reason for collecting and what to collect, and this is illustrated with a series of seven full page plates showing how earthenware is made in a Staffordshire factory.

A detailed Table shows the possessor of old earthenware how to identify his specimens, and over 200 marks are given. With Lists of Prices, Glossary, Bibliography, and hints as to Forgeries, and suggestions throughout as to the best means of collecting with profit, the volume is a thoroughly reliable working handbook for all who are interested in old English earthenware.

P.S.—A beautifully illustrated booklet, telling all about Unwin's "Chats" Series of practical handbooks, for collectors, will be sent free to any address on application.

Haileybury College

By Rev. L. S. MILFORD. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

We have lately been told that Mr. Gladstone pronounced the public schools to be the most remarkable of British institutions—more wonderful than Parliament itself—and therefore this justification may be claimed (if any be needed) for the account of Haileybury College which is being prepared by the Rev. L. S. Milford. It is characteristic of our nation to combine diversity of method with unity of aim, and it should be interesting to others besides Haileyburians to read this history of the growth and development of the school which succeeded to the home and the name of the famous college of the Honourable East India Company in Hertfordshire.

The Editor has been successful in collecting much fresh information about the early days of the school, and the description of recent developments will serve to accentuate the contrast between September, 1862, and September, 1908.

T. FISHER UNWIN

The Place of Animals in Human Thought

By Countess MARTINENGO-CESARESCO, Author of "Lombard Studies," "Italian Characters in the Epoch of Unification," etc. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 32 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

This is probably the most comprehensive work that has yet appeared on the conceptions of animals manifested in the speculations of primitive man, and in the great religions of the world. Among the subjects treated are: Soul Wandering as it Concerns Animals; The Greek Conception of Animals; Animals at Rome; Plutarch the Humane; The Faith of Iran; Zoroastrian Zoology and The Hebrew Conception of Animals.

The book, while it is the outcome of years of study and research, will appeal not only to folk-lorists and students of religion, but to the general reader, particularly if he be a lover of animals.

THE MODERN MOTHER:

A Guide to Girlhood, Motherhood, and Infancy.

By Dr. H. LAING GORDON

FULLY ILLUSTRATED.

Demy 8vo, 6/- net.

THIS WORK marks in its own line the opening of a new epoch. Hitherto such works have been devoted to treatment and a study of the abnormal; here these subjects yield precedence to prevention and a commonsense exposition of the normal. The author, imbued with the spirit of modern preventive medicine, points out the errors and abuses of modern life (so easily avoided and yet so easily yielded to) which affect injuriously the health of women and children; at the same time he clearly assists the mother and others to understand the physiology of womanhood and motherhood, the care of the infant and young girl, and the detection and treatment of common complaints. The subjects of heredity, environment, education and schools, the home-training of children, the physical development of the body, and the position of woman in modern life, are amongst the topics of the day which are touched upon in a new light in this concisely written book; each of its three sections, Girlhood, Motherhood, and Infancy, provides the mother, the schoolmistress, and the intelligent nurse with a fascinating and easily understood guide and high ideals. The whole subject of the Modern Mother is treated with penetrating observation from the sympathetic standpoint of varied experience rather than from the narrow one of the dogmatic specialist.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Star and other radical papers have been making all sorts of impertinent comments on the action of the Duke of Norfolk in selling his Holbein picture for £60,000. We do not notice that these amiable organs of opinion have given anything like the same prominence to the fact that the Duke has just made a free gift to the town of Sheffield of a park of the same value as the picture he has just sold. That is Democracy all over: take all you can get without gratitude and without thanks, and never lose an opportunity for abusing and belittling the giver. The Duke of Norfolk has quite as much right to sell his picture as the editor of the Star has to sell a book out of his library. The difference between the two cases is merely this: that whereas if Mr. Parkes of the Star were reduced to the pass of selling his library it is safe to assume that the proceeds of the sale would pass into Mr. Parkes's own pockets; in the case of the Duke of Norfolk the £60,000 produced by the sale of his picture has gone to the Catholic Church Schools. The Duke of Norfolk has probably no use whatever for the gratitude or respect of the class of people who read the Star and similar newspapers, but when a gentleman of his position and character sacrifices one of his most cherished possessions for the purpose of raising money to endow the schools of his own church is it too much to expect that he should be protected from rancorous abuse and spiteful innuendo? Apparently it is. What a commentary on the minds of the people who are so anxious to make us believe that their only anxiety is to secure "justice for the masses" and "freedom for the enslaved people" is hereby provided! Truly, by their fruits ye shall know them.

George Bernard Shaw is very indignant because the Censor has declined to license the performance of Mr. Shaw's new play, which is touchingly entitled "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet." And naturally Mr.

Shaw has rushed into ill-considered print on the subject, or, to use the pompous language which Mr. Shaw will no doubt prefer, has "issued a statement to the Press." According to the author of "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet," "the decision whether a play is morally fit to be performed or not rests with the King absolutely." This will be news to the King, and Mr. Shaw's thinly-veiled sneers about the King's faith and the King's confidence in his own judgment are worthy of your true Suffragette-minded man. Mr. Shaw knows as well as most people know that the responsibility of having dared to "turn down" "Blanco Posnet" rests with the Lord Chamberlain, who acts on the advice of Mr. Redford; but it no doubt suits Mr. Shaw's exaggerated idea of his own importance that people should imagine that His Majesty took a day off from the affairs of State for the purpose of reading "Blanco Posnet." Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown, saith the poet, though the poet, of course, never saw a Derby Day. But the uneasy state of kingship is at any rate mitigated by the fact that it does not happen to be the King's duty to read Shaw's plays. Of course, Mr. Shaw's remarks about the King were set forward especially for the American market. The play is unfit for performance in England; consequently it must be boomed for foreign parts.

So have we profit
In losing of our prayers.

And, having indulged in impertinence to the King, Mr. Shaw naturally proceeds to be impertinent to the English people. He pretends to labour under the delusion that the people of England, or, at any rate, a large section of them, imagine that the "Merry Widow" presents "a complete, satisfactory and edifying view of human motive and destiny," which, of course, is bunkum. We have never seen the "Merry Widow," nor do we propose to gaze on it; but we have seen Mr. Shaw's play, "Getting Married," and we should like to wager that, whether the "Merry Widow" presents a complete, satisfactory and edifying view of human destiny and motive or not, it presents a much decenter and honester view than did Mr. Shaw's "masterpiece."

With his customary obliquity of assertion Mr. Shaw assures us that he does not know why "Blanco Posnet" has been declared unfit to exist. Then he goes on to say that he does know. Here are his own words:

I repeat that I do not know why the play has been declared unfit to exist. It is a very simple and even crude melodrama, with absolutely no sexual interest whatever. It represents a little community of violent, cruel, sensual, ignorant, blasphemous, bloodthirsty backwoodsman, whose conception of manliness is mere brute pugnacity, and whose favourite sport is lynching. Into this welter of crude newspaperised savagery there suddenly comes a force—not mentioned in "The Merry Widow"—to which they give the name of God, the slightest regard for which they make it a point of honour to despise as mere weakness of character. That force nevertheless, at the crisis which is the subject of the drama, makes them do its will and not their own in a manner very amazing to themselves, and, I should hope, not altogether unedifying to the spectators.

I am given to understand that the introduction of this force into my play as a substitute for the simple cupidities and concupiscences of "The Merry Widow" is the feature that renders the play unfit for performance. It was precisely the feature which made the play worth writing to me. What is called the struggle of a man with God is the most dramatic of all conflicts; in fact, the only one that makes really good drama. But our royal rule is that conflict with God cannot be permitted on the stage. Except when the name of God is taken altogether in vain, by way of swearing, the Divine Antagonist must be spoken of, even by the most hardened and savage outlaws, with the decorum and devotional respect observed by our Bishops.

This is the ancient and fish-like Shaw method. In the New Age Shaw poses as a Freethinker and a Bible-smasher. In "Blanco Posnet" it seems he is to teach us something about the Divine nature. And he is to convince us that "the struggle of a man with God is the most dramatic of all conflicts," and that it is an admirable subject for a crude melodrama by Mr. Shaw. For our own part, we can only say that if Mr. Shaw knew anything about God, or cared twopence for the idea of God or the integrity of that idea in God's creatures, men and women, he would never have tried to make money out of "Getting Married."

The fact is that Shaw is a Suffragist from the top of his scalp to the tips of his toe-nails. He is the cunning and the subtle enemy of the natural decencies. There is a natural decency about marriage, and Shaw and his gang are, of course, irked by it. For the last five years at any rate they have been labouring and shrieking hard to get rid of it. What they want is free love. The Censor has given them yards of rope, and they have strained every inch of it. In the name of high thinking they have descended into the kennels and stews and dark corners of intellectuality, and pretended to discover there wisdom and honour. And now, if you please, it is to be the turn of the natural decency which is in every man's heart with regard to the Divinity. "God," says Shaw, "will at least make a fine subject for a play—that is to say, for a crude melodrama. There will be money in it if you can shock people enough, and here goes." The natural and considered views of mankind on this subject are nothing to Shaw. There are to be no sanctities when Shaw is about, and we are to make a mock and a raree show of the Holy Spirit in order that Bayswater may giggle and Shaw may add a few more paltry pounds to his banking account. We note that Shaw will publish "Blanco Posnet" in England. There is no Censor to prevent him; but there are laws against blasphemy, and if "Blanco Posnet" should turn out to be a blasphemous work the law should be set in motion, not only against Shaw, but against his publishers. Shaw and the people who hang round him make a great outcry when prosecutions are suggested. But if anybody stole Mr. Shaw's watch or broke into Mr. Shaw's house there would be a prosecution. As a good Socialist Shaw should admit that the thief or the burglar was probably hungry or required money, and that consequently there could be no real harm in the theft or burglary. The harm lies in the fact that the culprit has broken the law. If Mr. Shaw or his publishers choose to break the law, why should they not be punished? Of course, it may be that "Blanco Posnet" is not sufficiently objectionable to bring it within the blasphemy laws; in which case we shall have to put up with it, just as we have had to put up with "Getting Married." Really, what Bayswater wants is not "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet," but the showing-up of George Bernard Shaw.

Of course, the Anarchist section of the Press has come out very strong over "Blanco Posnet." Mr. Redford's action is described as "a menace to freedom," and "an unwarrantable interference with the liberty of thought." We are disposed to believe that the freedom of Mr. Shaw can be very well curtailed without damage to society, and as for his liberty of thought, he is welcome to think what he likes provided he does not attempt to thrust the result upon people who do not want it. One of Mr. Shaw's friends utulates as follows:

The Press is not free; it is shackled with business considerations. And authorship is mainly a study of what will sell. A Miltonic fervour is not to be expected of either journalists or novelists in the mass, and so the revival of the censorship is a real menace. For who else should care much? What is to inspire Parliament with any respect for literature, or any thought of its old and glorious traditions? It is possible that a conspicuous martyrdom would do it, and Mr. Bernard Shaw might be willing to go to gaol, if he could, for a defiance to the King's official; but I do not know the theatrical proprietor who would go with him. Martyrdom is not business. So, being helpless, Mr. Shaw keeps his temper, and our free nation sees him gagged without a care.

Well, THE ACADEMY is free, and business considerations do not concern it, and in the opinion of THE ACADEMY the censorship of Shaw is an admirable affair. And as for Bernard Shaw going to prison or being more disposed to martyrdom than the average theatrical manager, the notion is preposterous. We believe that Mr. George Edwardes would just as soon go to prison for principle's sake as Mr. Bernard Shaw. Mr. Bernard Shaw will never go to prison for principle's sake, for the very simple reason that, outside money-making and sensation-mongering, he does not know what his principles are. He declines even to limp the streets with the Suffragists, and as for prison—brr! it would not suit him. All the same, if "Blanco Posnet" in book form is blasphemous enough we hope the authorities will consider the question and be careful not to have it tried by City Aldermen. To have done three months for what he conceived to be principle's sake would send Mr. Shaw down to posterity much more gracefully than his plays will. Up to the present he has done nothing which is to the credit of either his principles or his sincerity.

Vanity Fair has been at it again. In the course of a "poem" about Swinburne, our contemporary's poet, Crowley, gives us the following sublime stanza:

So, Swinburne, sleep! That which is written is written.
I will not weep. The torch of song is smitten
Into dry stray leaves elsewhere doomed for sure
To damp decay, Victorian manure,
Miasmal squelch, black slough to mire the Sun,
The stink and belch and snivel of Tennyson!

Surely Mr. Frank Harris must have known Tennyson, even as he knew Swinburne, Carlyle, Matthew Arnold, Darwin, Robert Browning, George Meredith, and possibly Mrs. Aphra Ben. "The stink and belch and snivel of Tennyson!" And yet we read on another page of our contemporary that "through Vanity Fair advertisers have an unrivalled opportunity for reaching . . . the cultivated classes of the United Kingdom, the Continent and throughout the English-speaking world." Crowley rounds off his effort with the bald statement: "There is no God," which comes rather richly from the founder of that redoubtable religious brotherhood, the "A. A." or 'Appy 'Arrises. That Frank Harris has a real taste in poetry, however, is amply indicated by the fact that he publishes opposite Crowley some lines by a Miss Oyler:

Do you see the breakers falling,
Thund'ring madly on the shore?
We can hear the sea-birds calling
O'er the ocean's sullen roar,
And the air with brine is freighted
And the foam flies high and free:
Ev'ry nerve's exhilarated
When the wind blows off the sea!

Watch, a wall of foam—a hollow,
And the seaweed sweeps away,
For the waters bid it follow
In their train of silver spray;
With the rattling shingle giving
Vent to wild, unbounded glee.
Surely life is worth the living
When the wind blows off the sea!

We wonder what Mr. Harris's friend, George Meredith, would have thought of this dithyramb? It is infinitely to be preferred to Crowley, truly; but "the cultivated classes in the United Kingdom, the Continent and throughout the English-speaking world" will think their own thoughts about Frank Harris's powers of poetical judgment, which, as a matter of fact, would seem to be just about as bad as Mr. Shorter's.

News from the inner court of things!

The idea of a John Bull League is catching on all over the country. We hope to have everything in readiness at the end of the summer. The League will take a short cut through every other existing organisation—applying the one test of Common Sense to all the problems of the day, and uniting in one great composite body all who—ignoring the platitudes of priests and politicians, and putting aside all cant and self-righteousness—are prepared to think for themselves, act for themselves, and rely upon themselves. Instead of thinking so much about the next life, its members will make the most of this; instead of looking to the Government for everything, they will endeavour to govern themselves; the world will be their country, mankind their brethren—to be worthy men and women, their religion; they will not be any less sinners than others—but they won't be "miserable" ones. The League will be inaugurated at a great meeting in London, and after that meetings will be called in every large town, and local branches formed. It will be a political body without party, and, we hope, a religious one, without creed. The members will be taught to keep their bodies healthy and their minds clean, and that then their souls will look after themselves.

Thus Bottomley. We take it, of course, that the chair of physical development will be given to Professor Vivian, and that Professor Bottomley will occupy the chair of moral philosophy. We quite agree that the readers of John Bull need to be taught to keep their bodies healthy and their minds clean. And as for their souls, when you come to think of it, Bottomley does well to disclaim responsibility. In the next paragraph our friend the philosopher speaks of "the Rex v. Bottomley scandal." "Scandal" is good.

Mr. Douglas Ainslie has been writing to T. P.'s Weekly about T. P.'s criticism of "The Song of the Stewarts." Here is T. P.'s reviewer's reply:

[I do not think that Mr. Ainslie has quite understood my reason for quoting the "prosaic" lines that he mentions. I did not wish to prove that he was a prosaic writer, but that his choice of subject-matter inevitably condemned him to treat in poetry themes which are obstinately prosaic—so far as modern writers and readers are concerned, at all events. We know that Homer sometimes nods; there is, I suppose, no such thing as a poet who has not written dull lines. But these faults are the faults of the poet; whereas the dullness of such lines as

" . . . and from William descend
The Earls of Arundel whose bloods with the Dukes of Norfolk blend

By the marriage of Mary the heiress with the Duke whose life hath end

In the days of Queen Elizabeth," is the fault of the form which Mr. Ainslie has chosen.—
THE REVIEWER.]

Which leaves us without doubt that T. P.'s reviewer's knowledge of "form" is vast.

VILLON

THEY threw me from the gates: my matted hair
Was dank with dungeon wetness; my spent frame
O'erlaid with marish agues: everywhere
Tortured by leaping pangs of frost and flame,
So hideous was I that even Lazarus there
In noisome rags array'd and leprous shame,
Beside me set had seemed full sweet and fair,
And looked on me with loathing.

But one came

Who laid a cloak on me and bore me in Tenderly to an hostel quiet and clean;
Used me with healing hands for all my needs.
The mortal stain of my reputed sin,
My state despised, and my defiled weeds,
He hath put by as though they had not been.

SYCORAX AT KNIGHTSBRIDGE

THE other afternoon, taking our life in our hands, we ventured to walk into the very jaws of the lion as it were. Recollections of the fate suffered by Orpheus at the hands of the Mænads circled around our devoted head like so many bats; we thought of Scylla, we considered Charybdis, we mused on the syrens, and we remembered the foul witch Sycorax, as we passed dauntlessly over the threshold of Prince's Skating Rink and entered the ominous precincts of the Suffragist "fare," which is now in "full swing." Three ladies of sour aspect at the gates recalled visions of Cerberus; but with honey cakes in the shape of shilling entrance fees, we propitiated this terrible trinity, and found ourselves plunged into the very heart of "the monstrous regiment of women," engaged in their priest-like task of selling chocolates, dolls, ungraceful and unmentionable garments and what-nots in the furtherance of their noble scheme for collecting money for the Suffragist cause. Our determined efforts to maintain an innocent, not to say cherubic, expression of countenance were only partially successful; but we rejoice to say that their failure extended apparently only to the male portion of the camp, and their more or less masculine supporters among the female element. Briefly, Sycorax, who with age and envy had grown into a hoop, suspected us from the first, and Sycorax represented about three-fourths of the ladies present. Her cruel suspicions were apparently shared by a gentleman with a black moustache, a blue serge suit, a ferocious aspect, and quite abnormally large feet, who carefully dogged our footsteps as we wended our way round the "exhibition." Our sagacious readers will have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the women Suffragists have been reduced to the pass of providing themselves, in case of accidents, with a male "chucker-out," which is very creditable to their common-sense, while throwing a lurid light on the state of their consciences. Ladies who are not female Suffragists, when they are engaged in the joyful task of presiding at the stalls of bazaars and jumble-sales, do not as a rule find it necessary to invoke the assistance of ex-members of that fine force, the police, to protect them:

and that the particular ladies who are presiding over the present Suffragist exhibition should feel it necessary to employ such aid is a caustic commentary on the state of affairs which would be produced if, as Heaven forbid, they succeeded in obtaining the votes for which their souls hanker. It also provides an amusing illustration of the hopelessness of the struggle to upset the laws of Nature in which our good friend Sycorax is engaged. All law and all order rest ultimately on physical force, and physical force is male and not female, and even poor Sycorax, for all her screams and protests, has to admit it; and while she is engaged on the one hand in promoting an "exhibition" of foolishly irrelevant trifles, which constitutes, taking it altogether, an impudent defiance of man, on the other hand, she thinks it necessary to call in man to protect her from the possible results of this impudent defiance. Half a dozen men could walk into the women Suffragists' exhibition at Prince's Skating Rink, turn all the women out, make hay of the exhibits, and put a stop to the whole proceedings, including the heavy-footed parade of the gentlemen from Scotland Yard, in about five minutes. The fact that there are not half a dozen men in London who would think twice about doing such a thing proves the utter futility of the exhibition, and the contempt with which the whole movement is regarded by men of every class and every kind. Nobody takes the least notice of the exhibition, and on the occasion when we were present we should like to wager that there were not ten people present who had paid for admission; while the trade which was going on was, as far as we could see, entirely confined to the sale of tea and cakes, which were being consumed in alarming quantities by hordes of women, interspersed with an occasional sheepish hobbledohey. Our eagle eye, sweeping rapidly but carefully over the whole assembly, was able to discover the presence of only three pretty girls, and the prettiest of these came forward and offered us a box of sweets in the prettiest manner imaginable. We were cut to the heart by the impossibility in which we found ourselves of buying her sweets, owing to the fact that the money so expended would have perforce been devoted to the purposes of furthering an object which we so heartily abhor. But if the young lady in question has sweets to dispose of, either for her own benefit or for that of any other charitable or meritorious cause, we shall be prepared to buy them in bulk if she will call at this office; for we feel that she and her like by their mere existence afford the strongest argument which can be brought against the woman's Suffrage movement, and the strongest proof that the movement is ultimately ordained to complete and irreparable failure. It is all very well for Sycorax to proclaim that men are brutes and tyrants; that she does not want them; and that she is determined in future to be independent of them. But unless she can persuade girls and women who are not of the Sycorax brand to aid and abet her, her protests and her declamations will not even be listened to. She has had the sense to see this after a great many years, and she has reluctantly been obliged to call to her assistance the young, the pretty, the womanly, and the charming of her sex. A certain section of these ladies have responded to her call, and for a few months they have enjoyed the excitement and the novelty of the whole business; but the novelty is a thing of the past, and the excitement becomes every day less and less. On the other hand, the ordinary natural instincts of womanhood are implanted in their breasts; and as time goes on they do not wear off or become less. On the contrary. Consequently, the moment a man who is not a male Suffragette appears on the scene, they come up and offer him sweets (God bless them) to the confusion of Sycorax, and the putting out of countenance of the professional chucker-out whom she em-plays. We said just now that it would be an easy task for any half-dozen men in London to go and break up the women's Suffragist Exhibition and make hay of the exhibits. A much easier, and at the same time a much more agreeable plan, would be for half a dozen men of what the advertising columns of the newspapers describe as "good appearance and address" to go round and make love to the young women in the exhibition. Inside of a week they would all become members of the Anti-Suffrage League; Sycorax would be left lamenting, and Caliban would be out of a job.

REVIEWS

TWO POINTS OF VIEW

England and the English, from an American Point of View. By PRICE COLLIER. (Duckworth and Co., 7s. 6d. net.)

Americans: An Impression. By ALEXANDER FRANCIS. (Melrose, 6s. net.)

It is salutary for us, both individually and nationally, that on occasion we should obtain a glimpse of ourselves as others see us from some more reputable and responsible source than a German comic sheet or a visitor's letter to one of our papers, and we welcome such glimpses, only making the condition that they should come as reflections in a mirror, not in a distorting-glass. To the foreigner (excluding the American from that term) we are something of a puzzle; we always have been, and always shall be; he sees only the surface machinery of English life, and rarely comprehends the motive powers of character and social interplay that drive it. Language and temperament form effectual bars, and we are to him a people to be watched, criticised, laughed at or sneered at as the case may be, but rarely to be understood. With the Americans the problem becomes less complicated; year by year they invade our metropolis, and a fair proportion of them are enabled to explore that sanctum of the Englishman's cherished secrets, his home, thus arriving at a more satisfactory idea, on the average, of the national characteristics. When they write about us—they must be driven to do so in sheer retaliation for the volumes we have written on them and their country—they show as a rule a level-headedness which proves that observation has adjusted opinion. We do not refer, of course, to the comments on English men and matters which leap from volcanic headlines in the blatant daily Press of their cities.

The author of "England and the English" has contributed a very distinct and reasonable account, on the whole, of his experiences and impressions during lengthened periods of residence in this island. He gets in some shrewd hits here and there, but never places one "below the belt" as far as we can see, albeit he is by no means always correct. His errors are those of misinformation or ignorance or exceptional personal happenings, and never arise from wilful embellishment or disregard of truth. For example, in describing the average private hotel of London, he says:

The rooms are damp, a small grate-fire mitigates the gloom of the sitting-room, but bedroom and dressing-room retain their damp-blanket atmosphere throughout our stay. A tin tub is brought in in the morning and evening, and you bathe as a protection from the cold. A sound rubbing with a coarse towel takes the place of a fire, or steam heat. No doubt many people die in becoming accustomed to this method of keeping warm, but those who survive have conquered for themselves the greatest empire extant.

Not many hotels, we fancy, would pay expenses for twelve months if this were a representative state of things; the aspersions might be true of a few dingy buildings in the Euston Road or down some shabby side-street of Bloomsbury, but the argument is the fallacious one familiar to logic from an individual case to generalities. Again, "Nowhere in America does one hear so constantly the nasal twang as in England," an assertion questionable in the extreme; "as in the Mile End Road" would have been more correct, perhaps. And this is really nonsense:

The complexions of the English have often been exploited for our benefit. The damp climate and the exercise out-of-doors produce the red, they say. But on examination it proves to be not the red of the rose, but the red of raw beef, and often streaky and fibrous at that. The features are large and the faces high-coloured, but it is not a delicate pink, it is a coarse red. At a distance, the effect is charming, bright, refreshing; but close to, often rather unpleasant.

Such a libel on the fair faces of incomparable Englishwomen cannot be allowed to go unchallenged, especially in the season—a walk in Bond Street or in Piccadilly on any of these brilliant mornings would disprove it completely. And there are mistakes over one or two questions of salaries. We will pass on, however, to note some more pleasing aspects of the book. The author is diametrically opposed—and emphatic in his opposition—to the idea so prevalent among foreign citizens that the Englishman is "dull"; he is, au contraire, "a very cheerful and boyish person"; he "makes a business of keeping young"; it is only our slowness and steadiness and tenacity, our innate faculty of taking things coolly, which tempt the superficial adjective; and a neat point is made here, although the pronouns are somewhat hardly used:

The people who have produced Chaucer, Shakespeare, Swift, Sterne, Sydney Smith, Charles Lamb, and Robert Louis Stevenson may well laugh at any accusation of their lack of intellectual humour; while the people who have gobbled the wealth and commerce of the world for a century may look on with some amusement while other nations call them dull. . . . The English genius is not for analysis, but for action. He seeks to act, to do, to accomplish, and the first necessity is to get people, or things, or horses, or ships, or balloons, or motors, steady. They cannot start, they cannot be controlled, without steadiness. They demand this quality above all others in their statesmen, their soldiers, as well as in their horses. There is no talk of glory as in France; no constant vision of self-advertisement, and of self-advancement by means of the reporter's pen and camera. England expects every man to do his duty, that's all. The glory and the advertisement may take care of themselves.

An admirably critical balance is preserved when the author compares and contrasts American with English institutions and customs, and he freely condemns his own country's methods where necessary; the pernicious influence of a rapid-fire Press, for instance, is censured with judgment:

The dusty chatter of the newspapers is working upon the mental make-up of mankind. . . . Too much comes pelting upon minds untrained to analyse and incapable of sifting the grain from the chaff. The more generally educated, and the more generally curious mentally, are those who suffer most from this dust-cloud of the newspapers. Men who are only intelligent enough to keep in one way, and to do one task, and to serve one master, are diverted, excited, made discontented, and led astray, by this enormous variety of news, which comes to them every day, but which concerns them not at all. . . . Many people are like children, to whom it would be a mercy to keep them in ignorance of many of the grosser happenings which fill the papers.

And on the succeeding page there is a capital bit of good-humoured banter at our expense:

Englishmen, however, still take their newspapers into their confidence, and have a naïve way of writing to them on all sorts of subjects. If an Englishman rows down the Thames and stops for luncheon at an inn and is overcharged, he promptly writes to his newspaper, and later on his first letter is followed by others, in which the comparative merits and cost of light luncheons on the Continent, in Canada, in Central Asia, in Seringapatam, in Kamtschatka, and everywhere else where Englishmen have eaten and drunk—and where have they not eaten and drunk?—is discussed at length. This goes on till we have a complete international history of mid-day gastronomies. Then the editor writes at the bottom: "We cannot continue this correspondence," and the affair is over.

This, and some other paragraphs in the same style, are sufficiently near to the truth to be amusing without a trace of annoyance.

In the matter of self-reliance and a certain national average of strength, the deduction is made that our manner of permitting youth to associate with age, combined with our public-school system, induces these qualities, with the result that "the English lad is in many respects a man. He is far more to be depended upon, a far more companionable person, and much more at home in the world" than the French and German youth. "If the three of them go out to the Colonies we all know what happens. The French boy keeps the books, the German boy attends to the foreign correspondence, and the English boy manages both."

The conclusions which are finally arrived at are not altogether favourable to our conceit of ourselves as a nation. Here and there a weak place in our armour is indicated; the slow incursion of an alien element in our population is one—"those who are leaving England are Saxons and Celts, while those who are coming in are Teutons and Jews." America, however, as we shall note when considering the complementary volume, has a much more pressing immigration problem of her own. With the definite statement that England has reached a point from which her decadence may be prophesied we cannot be expected to agree, and some of the sentences on this subject are distinctly amusing:

It is almost laughable to think what would happen should America or Germany start to build ships against her. England would be bankrupt in ten years, her population would emigrate to Canada, South Africa, Australia, and the United States, and the lonely island would become a fourth-rate Power, used principally as a playground by Americans.

Would she? We really think not! A Government with some sense of responsibility would be in command before matters became critical, and "things would happen" of which these airy commentators have little notion; the Devon sea-kings have descendants among us yet. One other astounding slip we must pause to note, in the interests of all good Americans who read this book; the author alludes to Mr. Rudyard Kipling as "the greatest Englishman of letters now living"! And at the time those words were soberly written George Meredith was living, Swinburne was actively with us, not to mention Thomas Hardy. We hope—indeed, we know—that such an unbalanced judgment will not be supported by many Americans of any pretensions to literary equipment.

With the reservations we have noted the volume is a very happily composed compendium of remarks upon our island kingdom and its manners and customs, pungent without being ill-mannered, written—and we regard this as a compliment—in English of good parts and entirely free from slanginess, showing a capacity for analysis and inference quite above the average level of books of this class. Chapters on "Sport" and "An English Country Town" deserve special mention, but we cannot stay to illustrate their good points; and a short account of the Irish question rounds off a most interesting summary of the state of affairs in these dominions at the present day—from an outside point of view.

With curious opportuneness Mr. Alexander Francis issues his "Americans: an Impression" within a few days of the above book, so that in setting one against the other we can perhaps arrive at a fairly clear apprehension of the salient features of the two great nations which are united so closely by the tie of a common language, though often separated leagues apart in thought, feeling, and method. We notice that part of this second book was written in America, part in England, that it was revised in Russia, that the preface is dated from Calcutta, and that the author has lived in Australia and in South Africa, so that in all conscience his pronouncements ought to be cosmopolitan enough and free from bias. When we add that he has toured Europe, drops occasionally into Greek, and possesses a smattering of Yiddish, it will be seen that something in the way of book-making may be anticipated which shall carry a little more worth than the random jottings of a visitor's notebook; and we are not disappointed. With no disparagement to the work of Mr. Collier, this volume is scholarly to a degree, and investigates questions of temperament and national character in a manner that is distinguished and penetrating; a considerable logical faculty, the power of building up conclusions by precise and careful sentences, is also present in exceptional force.

Climate, perhaps, has had a good deal to do with making the American alert, pertinacious, and a trifle impatient; he is not, superficially regarded, a particularly attractive person as a rule; but we find that whenever he can Mr. Francis speaks a favourable word for him. The self-assertiveness of the people is due, he thinks, rather to superabundant vigour than to vanity; this makes them "impressible and volatile and disposed to run to extremes"; and while it is undeniable that their practical side has developed at the expense of their artistic capabilities and high intellectual output, a deeper life still exists "which has suffered no permanent evil from the gusts of commercial passion with which its surface is constantly swept." "A humble heart," he says, "has always been beneath their bluster and brag." His analysis of this undue boastfulness is very pretty:

It is easy to believe that to wield any kind of influence over the masses of an enormously democratic community in whom ultimate power lies, an individual must make his expressed opinions much more pronounced than his inward convictions. Therefore, when the nation, after its first years of national inexperience, which were characterised by unreasonable optimism, was in danger of growing diffident in face of its great and increasing responsibilities and tasks, its leaders made conscious exaggeration, in order to maintain the nation in a just appreciation of its powers; and the people, slow to see through the exaggeration, were quick to make it their own, and then were inevitably driven to spend themselves that they might make sure of the wealth, and to throw themselves into violent motions that they might make sure of the powers, which they had been told that they possessed. By this process, without gaining the assurance that they sought, they lost the secret of silence, dignity, and repose; and more than ever it seemed necessary, in order to impress the people, to resort to noise and effort, to act and effect. Then was the era of brag.

At the present time the author is of the opinion that bragging in America is in danger of becoming a lost art; an opinion with which we can hardly coincide.

Mr. Francis appears to have fraternised with the American student to an extent which few strangers outside the professorial staffs can manage, and as a consequence we have chapters on the American educational system which are thorough, and, when expedient, severe. Perseverance seems to be the dominant note of the young man who decides to "get on," and we are treated to the mythical but instructive story of the self-supporting student "reading from a volume of Xenophon which he held in his right hand, while with his left he sold socks, suspenders, and collar-buttons to the undergraduates." On the whole, the collegiate apparatus in vogue in the United States seems to be the best available when the immense discrepancy between the aims and desires of so huge a number of determined young men is taken into consideration, but the method of awarding the degree is open to revision. This honour goes "not for final proficiency in a coherent and well-balanced course of study, but for a pass in four subjects in each of four successive years, the whole number of subjects being in some colleges as disconnected, even as chaotic, as the student may please." The severity of disapproval, however, is reserved for the wonderful combination of ferocity and a bastard kind of sport which obtains under the denomination of "College Athletics." The importance attached to physical struggles between different colleges is altogether disproportionate to their value, and the motives which induce these often pitiable displays are of the poorest—"to command the esteem of their fellows and excite the admiration of the public" is the negation of sport as we regard it in England, and "to get their college into the limelight" is not much better. Over here we defend the game, as such. One revealing glimpse came to the author on his travels. He had yielded to the request of some victorious students for a congratulatory address; but afterwards the men explained that their extreme elation was due to the fact that one of the competing colleges had "meanly enticed their trainer from them by the offer of a higher salary than their college could afford to pay." It is a pity that the ordinary common-sense of the students does not save them from that sort of degradation, although, of course, we realise that many honourable exceptions must be made from this sweeping condemnation.

The question of the millions of aliens who seek the land of freedom, refugees from Russian despotism, Italian poverty, and other evils, is the subject of another capable inquiry. The immigration problem is becoming serious; last year 1,200,000 strangers settled in America; the descendants and successors of the seventeenth-century immigrants have become the natives of to-day; "and the new native, who was the immigration problem to the Indian, finds the new immigrant a problem to himself." The tremendous influx of families whose members are to a large extent non-combatants, neither equipped mentally nor physically for the fight which needs stamina and pluck, must in the long run have a weakening effect on the nation in spite of its size and resources, but we cannot spare space to quote from the very pertinent pages which Mr. Francis devotes to this important topic. We note with pleasure that he holds sound views on the matter of Socialism—"the most precious thing in the world," he remarks, "is the individual mind and soul with unfettered capacity for service and growth"; and with this we must conclude our glance at these informative volumes. Of the two, the latter probes more deeply into causes and discusses more finely and acutely the pressing problems of the day; its style is more literary, its results more profoundly significant and interesting. The former has a popular style, and a hasty reader might be inclined to give it precedence in point of entertainment. People of both nations will read both these books, and people of both nations will doubtless find that they can pick fairly large holes in each; but we welcome them as contributions to the elucidation of national behaviour and national characteristics which deserve to be widely circulated and gravely considered on both sides of the dividing ocean.

FIFTY YEARS OF IT

Fifty Years Of It. By the RT. HONBLE. SIR JOHN H. A. MACDONALD, K.C.B., Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland. (William Blackwood and Sons, price 10s. 6d. net.)

"THE year 1909 should have seen the celebration of the jubilee of the Volunteer Force." So begins Sir

John Macdonald's Introduction, and though the Territorial Army has taken the place of the Volunteers that new home army could not have been called into existence if the many thousands of Volunteers who have joined it had not done so. Thus Sir John Macdonald has every right to say "that the present year may be justly held to be the jubilee year of the Force which General Peel brought into being in 1859."

There is no living man, and there never has been one, so well qualified to tell of these fifty years, no one more capable of doing so than is the learned and gallant author. He was one of the very first enrolled in the Citizen Force in Edinburgh in 1859, just before he was called to the Bar; and, of course, he joined the Advocates' Company—No. 13. He writes: "I got no shilling, but was informed that my uniform must be made by the selected tailor of the company, and would be handed over to me on payment of so many pounds, shillings and pence sterling." Thence on he served in every possible grade (except Regimental Sergeant-Major) until he commanded, as Brigadier-General, the Forth Brigade, and finally retired in 1902. But he became Honorary Colonel of the Motor Volunteers in 1903, and now is still serving, because he is the Chairman of a Territorial Association. Sir John does not disguise a very justifiable pride that his career is a proof that Volunteering was no obstacle to professional progress. While advancing through the non-commissioned ranks to a commission, and through the junior commissioned ranks to command, with unusual rapidity, he also in process of time became Lord Advocate and then Lord Justice Clerk. In him history repeated itself. For the Volunteers of Edinburgh at the time of the Napoleonic wars were commanded by Lt.-Colonel Charles Hope, who also became Lord Advocate and then Lord Justice Clerk, and retained his command while holding these offices. Sir John remembers as a boy seeing him hopelessly paralysed but still in his carriage, attending every review of troops in the Queen's Park, Edinburgh.

In "Fifty Years Of It" we learn to know very thoroughly our Citizen Army. The Volunteers were organised first as companies only—and companies enrolled from the professional and tolerably well-to-do classes alone. They paid every penny of the cost of their uniform, arms and equipment. Then followed artizan companies, who were armed by Government, but they had to clothe themselves, and each man paid 10s. on enrolment and £1 in instalments. We are told that no case occurred of defaulting. Very soon regiments were formed, and Macdonald's company became part of the Edinburgh Volunteer Rifle Corps, afterwards to become the Queen's Rifle Volunteer Brigade. With much humour the earlier companies are sketched. Men of all ages joined them, and men too old to care to show themselves in uniform to their wondering (if too admiring) fellow-citizens used to come to the drill ground in multi great-coats and silk hats, disguising the Queen's livery underneath. But, young or old, they worked in those days with a will and generally averaged more than one drill a day. The author's first distinction was to be the Colour-Sergeant on the right of the 4th Artizan Co. on the right of the Edinburgh Rifles, and thus to be the first Volunteer that the Queen inspected when she reviewed the Scottish Volunteers in 1860. But the book is so full of detail both of Sir John Macdonald's career and of the careers of the officers of the Queen's Brigade and of the doings of that most distinguished corps that if we began to quote we should fill column after column.

Royal and other reviews, manoeuvres, camps of exercise, regimental drills, rifle practice, and war training are all described in the minutest details. It is all evolution and progress. We begin with stiff barrack-square drill, with invectives hurled at it by the gallant author. Then looser and more comfortable movements. "Sham fights" gradually develop into manoeuvres. Some of the most sham of sham fights are humorously reproduced. Shooting and the progress in skill at arms, which soon attended rational training, show us how the Citizen Army in that most essential branch of soldiering in some cases led the Regular Army. Sir John Macdonald, from the very beginning of his career, was a rebel against old cut-and-dried stiff drill. Without any doubt he has influenced as much as most of our Army generals the rescue of our soldiers from a multitude of useless movements. To the old-fashioned soldier of the 'sixties and 'seventies he was a detested Radical. The Royal Duke who was so many years Commander-in-Chief, seeing a movement performed on a parade which he had forgotten that he had sanctioned, was heard to mutter: "That will be that — Scotch lawyer again." But by all the most progressive soldiers, such as Lord Wolseley, Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir Henry Brackenbury (who were his contemporaries), his common-sense ideas were very welcome and very generously acknowledged.

But the book is too long. Manoeuvres are recorded with detail worthy of a campaign. The incidents of a field day are lent the importance of those of a battle. We do not venture to dispute the importance of most of the points in Infantry training for which Sir John Macdonald struggled—and successfully struggled—but he repeats his arguments in favour of them too often. First he begins with a full brief against the extreme of step drill under which he became a soldier, and he is an able counsel for the prosecution. But as in his long career drill book after drill book appeared without the progress that he hoped for, after each new Book (the "Book" he always calls each of them) he argues out his case afresh with voluminous quotations. The arguments are nearly always sound, the quotations from great captains are quite unimpeachable; but when we hear it all over afresh about four times (more than once the same quotation being repeated) it becomes rather wearisome. In 1886 the author wrote a pamphlet, "Common-sense on Parade, or Drill without Stays." In the book of Infantry training published in 1902 he claims that 146 out of 178 points of reform urged in that pamphlet had been included, and he shows much due pride and gratitude. Rifle training had his keen support from the time that he got his commission in the Queen's Brigade (The Blacks, from the colour of his uniform). He became a member of the Council of the National Rifle Association while he was a Captain and was the origin of the organisation which trained the Scottish Volunteer team to such a very successful career in international rifle shooting. A lighter side of Wimbledon is recorded on page 295, when Sir John Macdonald earned his last fee as a pleader. A young officer was tried for stealing a halfpenny from a young lady. The Lord Advocate was counsel for the prosecution, and the poor subaltern was convicted. The next morning her host reminded the fair litigant that she had not paid her counsel his fee—and so we read: "She did, putting her lips to my cheek, simply and prettily." Happy Lord Advocate!

The last stage of this career was a very gratifying one. Three companies of the Queen's Brigade went to the war in South Africa and acquitted themselves well. And Sir John Macdonald commanded 4,000 Volunteers in a special training camp for a month. His Brigade orders at the beginning of the training obtained a warm eulogy from Lord Wolseley, and he had every right to the pride which he owns he felt when he received his first pay as a soldier, as part of a force which made the despatch to South Africa possible of an army larger than has ever moved 7,000 miles over sea. For the first five days of this camp the Brigadier attended morning parades, then went to Edinburgh and sat on the Bench all day, returning by train at night! Well may Sir John Macdonald claim that "this was, perhaps, an unprecedented combination of duties in the world's history, and scarcely possible in any other country but our own." Scarcely, indeed! But, thank Heaven! it is possible in our country. What would have become of us if we had not always had men imbued with some of Sir John Macdonald's spirit and patriotism? Long may he sit on the Bench. Long may he live to give his skilled services to the country as Chairman of a Territorial Association; and let us join him in his "expression of an earnest prayer that the nation may be roused to a sense of its duty to provide an efficient system of defence against invasion, and not be content till it is no longer a sham that can deceive nobody except those who, from motives of selfish ease or false economy, practise an unpatriotic self-deception."

SHORTER REVIEWS

Samson Unshorn. By REGINALD TURNER. (Chapman and Hall, Ltd., 6s.)

It is a rare thing to find in a book which confessedly is devoted to the study of one person's individuality such a consistency of keen character-drawing as the author has given us in his account of the career of this modern Samson. James Maxwell, the hero, too careless of other people's opinions to be welcomed universally, yet too full of animal spirits and a certain warped friendliness to be actively disliked, is introduced to the reader at a critical point in his boyhood: the headmaster of his school has delicately suggested to the home authorities that James should be "removed" at the end of the term to save the disgrace of a definite expulsion. This decides the amiable couple whom the lad has hitherto regarded as his father and mother to tell him that he is really only their adopted son; with this admission, his character receives the impulse which sets it going defiantly to the end. Realising his indebtedness, he determines never to give his foster-parents cause for sorrow, and succeeds in completing his education at school and college.

Then come days of hesitation. His acute mind observes that people buy what they want in the way of literature, not what is good for them, and after going through a short training in the editorial office of an evening paper he begins his brilliant though not very creditable career as purveyor of snippets to the public. With a sublime indifference to literary aims he starts a journal on borrowed capital:

How It's Done was the title of the modest weekly, and a fortnight after publication it adopted the popular abbreviation and called itself H.I.D. It was the first result of Maxwell's observation and study. It professed to tell, in snappy paragraphs, all the secrets of the civilised world. "How It's Done" in the kitchen, the library, the boudoir, the Army and Navy and Civil Service, the pulpit, the prisons, the laboratory, in the provinces, the Colonies, on the Continent, and in Utopia, were only some of its divisions. The paper had special articles on "How Fortunes are Made" (read eagerly by people who would never make them); "How Businesses are built up"; "How Courage is developed," and so on. Experts wrote on "How It's Done" on the Railway, in the Factory, in the Air.

Fireside Fancies, Happy Sundays, The Half Holiday, followed in quick succession, leading to the crowning achievement of Daily Opinion, a half-penny addition to London's great news-sheets. The parallel to the actual state of affairs in London at the present moment is obvious, and the whole of this portion of the story is excellently written, bearing traces of inside knowledge and acute deductions. Maxwell's creed is summed up in this statement to a friend who endeavoured to argue with him:

A journalist is not a voice, the voice of a prophet, but an echo in which people hear themselves speaking. A newspaper—as my newspaper—is a record of what the world is saying, not an example of what it ought to say, or a forecast of what it will say. Only—and this is important—it must give the impression of speaking for itself; its only claim must be that sensible people will agree with it. It need never state that it is merely agreeing with sensible people.

We need not follow in detail the plot. When love comes to this Samson, and he finds that he has encountered a woman with a will as domineering as his own—a lady of title—the wooing is troubled, and in quite a masterly way the author has painted the courtship of these two. Things go all awry; Lady Gertrude marries another suitor, and Maxwell rather soberly weds a girl from his office, a winsome, affectionate little creature whose motherhood opens out new vistas of thought for the self-centred hero. In the end she dies, leaving him with a son, and the restraint of these latter scenes with his wife come near to being the best part of the book. The story is told simply and straightforwardly, in some places almost pugnaciously, and attempts no elevated or embellished style; this is quite consonant with the modern business setting of the chief events. The first two chapters hardly indicate the quality of the matter which is to follow, but after this introductory period the author seems to get into the swing of his task, and the reader is in the grip of strong interests and a vigorous set of men. The theme is fresh, capably dealt with, and a standpoint of impartiality is assumed that makes for unity and convinces at every turn of the narrative.

The Perjurer. By W. E. NORRIS. (Constable, 6s.)

MR. NORRIS is an adept at the craft of novel-writing, and never fails to reward the attentive reader. If we had to define his most prominent characteristic we should be inclined to say it was the knack—almost the art—of omitting all those superfluous sentences, all that padding in conversations, scenery and comment, which tempt the immature writer to eke out his tale to the regulation number of words. This latest story from his careful pen is no exception to the rule; it moves well from start to finish, and keeps to what we might term the "Norris level"—which is a very creditable level, if not an exceedingly high one. The perjury which gives the book its theme does not occur until over two hundred pages have been passed, but events lead up to it cleverly. Colonel Julyan, at the inquest on young Lord Lavernock, swears that he, and not another man, sat up playing cards with the dead man one night; by doing so he shields the lover of Helen Monk, the heroine, for Lord Lavernock, after losing heavily, had committed suicide in his bedroom, and a certain moral guilt rested upon whoever induced him to play for high stakes. This is, of course, a bare statement of the central incident of the book, and it is not to be imagined that the general tone of the story is gruesome; on the contrary, there are some very pleasant passages of humour. The introduction of a frivolous actress, secretly married to the good-for-nothing Lavernock, occasions a neat paragraph:

In this frankly idiotic piece she had two rather catching songs and a dance. The rest of her part was insignificant, or, to speak more accurately, she had none. What happened was, that from time to time somebody tickled her or gave her a sly dig in the ribs. She then doubled up and became convulsed with laughter, which communicated itself to her fellow-performers, spread in ripples across the footlights, gained stalls, boxes, pit and gallery, and culminated in a universal roar of hilarity. Apparently this was one of those subtle strokes of humour so dear to the British heart. Age cannot stale nor custom wither their exquisite monotony.

The love affairs of Susan Bligh, spinster, and Surgeon-Major Spurling, confirmed bachelor, are delightful. Mr. Norris adds to his list a worthy successor in this book.

Where Every Prospect Pleases. By EDMUND FRANCIS SELLAR. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THIS extraordinary book is quite apart from anything which hitherto has come under our notice. It rambles on in a disconnected, happy-go-lucky fashion, with neither plot nor interest of any appreciable value, dealing with absurd people who never do anything in the least degree probable or say anything in the least degree witty. The scene changes from England to Ceylon, and the tag of the title sufficiently indicates to a discerning reader the sort of fare he may expect, for the phrasing is stereotyped, and the consistent attempts to be funny are simply exasperating. Eighty pages are devoted to describing the proceedings of the saloon passengers en voyage to Colombo; not one of these people but would be a fit subject for a strait jacket. A sailor is dragged into the scene and given the name "Litelfare" merely for the sake of an obvious and silly pun. The chief character is by way of being a ventriloquist, and acts the clown in that and other ways on every possible and impossible occasion. He shows some members of a dinner party the steps of a dance, and this is the sort of thing that happens:

Next instant the extraordinary spectacle presented itself of three elderly gentlemen, without the accompaniment of music, solemnly jigging round the drawing-room. Mr. Tanqueray, the mentor, showing the way with all the lissom grace of a springbok, while the General and Archdeacon, their eyes glued to the ground, conscientiously and with the respective ease and agility of an elephant and a dancing bear, proceeded to follow suit.

The author is under a great misapprehension if he thinks that this style of writing and this sort of concoction is either amusing or instructive, and we are sorry to see him descending to the elaboration of such a hapless, witless, weariful tale.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY

Wenn sich meine Musik verständlich macht, der ist über allen Jammer der Welt erhaben.—BEETHOVEN.

(FIRST MOVEMENT.)

WOULDEST hear the very voice of mystery,
Inviolate silence speak?
It calls to thee,
It falls to thee;
Drops, drops on thy heart like coming rain upon the face,
As the sparse shower against the cheek.
Listen! thou art as a familiar where no foot hath been;
Thou lookest in where not an eye hath seen;
Thou art a guest in the forbidden place.
Wailing in the pained stillness breeds.
The night-wind never breathed it on the pine,
Never mixed of it the plaint of faded weeds;
Kindred has it none where pale grass waves,
And no stars shine,
And wet autumn drenches unremembered graves:
*To-morrow and to-morrow
The darkness and the sorrow;
The wail along the bitter way
Of the children of a day!*

(SECOND MOVEMENT.)

As the mists of morning go,
Fled all that woe;
Summer morn sends here
Her players, happiest of the year,
Skilled in lilting measures, fit to run
With nimble dancers i' the sun,
Such as once did of the dew-ball sup,
And house them in the acorn-cup,
Anon to foot the moon-washed knoll behind
The while Titania gave her ringlets to the wind.
Not for long the airy round
Followed of fairy sound;
In giant and in god grows jealousy,
So exquisite the elfin jollity.
Back into the day
The tricky dancers fade away
Before hoarse revel blasted forth
As from the throat of Thor and all his North,
Or from Thessalian skies the hour such mirth
Shook heaven, men heard it on the earth.

(THIRD MOVEMENT.)

Hark! a low voice sings
Of humble human things
The heart unto itself doth say,
And some other hearkens vainly, far away,
Bolder, now, it grows a shepherd's tune,
Who must for love forget his sheep;
Piping with the bird of June,
Waking and in sleep.
That summer stress
Of loitering loveliness,
Iterative bliss!
June's own minstrelsy it is:
Leafy, ineffable melodies
Persuade the silences.

Lead us, pastoral passion, lead
Down courses of the phantom seed
Wandering the autumn wind to lay
Its little life away;
Convene the tones, half odour and half sound,
Commended of the comfortable ground.
As when the winds in evening leaves begin,
Draw the deft caressing bow
Along the velvet, vespereal violin;
Put the smooth flute to the mouth,
And the woolly horn; blow as the warm winds blow.
Breathe as the soft wind steals
Upon the wild-flower when it feels,
At eventide, first kisses of the South.

(FOURTH MOVEMENT.)

Star-shed melody
As of glimmers of the sea!
Master, out of mortal reach
That utter voice, that mother speech;
Nor thine these strains it went before,
Spreading, dawn-like, to more and more.
Too vast, sublime,
For place and time.
Nature, her generant self, hath so imbued
With speech the locked and stolid wood;
Quickened the vulgar string
To what the thrushes sing;
Made the dumb brass brave
With splendour of the stellar stage;
Ay, Nature stoops to ravish once again
Unused ears of men
With snatches from the everlasting strain
That did the wandering worlds into their circuit draw:—
Life's hymn, her rhythmic order, voiceful law.

Earth from the murk of night
 Once more leaps into light!
 All things, from sky to clod,
 Rejoice again, they sing:
Be still and know that He is God!
 Earth, brightened by this riper day,
 Proudlie runs her mounting way;
 Voices on all the air
 Wake gladness there:
Have thou the quiet that is sight.
What He builds up shall none destroy;
Go thou the path, and eat thy bread with joy!

Cherubim
 And seraphim,
 On sheer, unwearied wing,
 Take up the song
 High as the heavens, strong as the heavens are strong:
The enduring soul shall unto gladness grow;
Faith shall no question make;
Desire her thirst shall slake;
Love shall have and know!

ADVENTURES AMONG THE PUBLISHERS

(BY A MINOR NOVELIST)

I AM not going to write any more novels. Before the London publishers as a body commit suicide, or file their own petitions in bankruptcy, I will explain the reason prompting me to take this serious step. In five words it is as follows:—

Novel-writing does not pay.

This is my fixed and unalterable belief. I would like to lose it, but as one who has ten novels to his credit (or discredit, as uncharitably inclined readers may assert) I cannot do so and at the same time retain a reputation for truthfulness.

Let me go into details. They may not make things very clear, but they ought to go some way towards showing why it is that publishers as a class wear fur coats and own motor-cars, while the majority of novelists live in garrets.

It seems a long time since I wrote my first book; yet it was only nine years ago. The volume ran to nearly 100,000 words, and represented the labour of many months. When this work, which I fondly regarded as a masterpiece, was finished, I sent it off to a literary agent, with instructions to sell it for a large sum, and then with the airy confidence of the beginner sat down to indulge in happy speculations as to the result. This, when it came, was not quite what I had anticipated, since it took the form of a demand for a fee of five guineas. However, having at this date more guineas and less knowledge than are now my lot, and thinking that literary agents probably followed the same business methods as money-lenders, I forwarded a cheque. At the end of eight months the agent returned the manuscript, accompanied by a letter stating that he could not "place" it. He did not, however, experience a similar difficulty where my five guineas were concerned. At any rate, he contrived to "place" them beyond recall. Still, and to do him justice, I am prepared to grant that he did take a certain amount of trouble to effect a sale, for he furnished me with the names of eleven firms to whose "readers" the book had been submitted. Judging from the condition of the opening chapter when it came into my hands again, I fancy that some of these experts must have thought they had been asked to pass a critical opinion upon the book's merits as a doormat, instead of as a literary production.

After this somewhat unsatisfactory experience I resolved to act as my own agent and save preliminary fees. Accordingly, as soon as the soiled pages were neatly re-typed I sent the volume off on its travels anew. The first four houses declined it, as did also the fifth. This one, however (that of Messrs. Macmillan, by the way), appeared to have given it more attention than the others, for the MS. came back with this helpful observation in blue pencil on the margin of one of the pages: "There is no such word as 'certainly' in the English language." Having erased this thoughtful criticism, I despatched the book to Messrs. —. Here, to my surprise, it met, after two months' suspense, with acceptance.

By this time my dreams of amassing a large fortune from Literature had long since disappeared. Hence, when I received an offer of £40 down for the entire copyright, I accepted it gladly. It was not much, perhaps—especially when it is remembered that I had paid one five guineas for typing and another five guineas for the abortive efforts of an agent to dispose of it; still, the book was a first book, and nobody else seemed inclined to offer me fourpence for it. All the same, I do not think Messrs. — made a bad business deal, or lost money by their enterprise. At any rate, the book went out of print almost immediately, and two impressions were sold in America. It also received over a hundred laudatory reviews (the Spectator giving it a column and a half), and three bad ones. Accordingly, I cannot consider that it was really so ill-written or uninteresting as to justify its refusal at the hands of the first sixteen firms to whom it had been submitted.

Although I only obtained £40 for this book, its publication certainly did me good, as I promptly obtained £60 worth of commissions from enterprising editors to write articles on the same subject matter. It also induced another firm to commission me to write a small volume in similar style, but of about half the length. The price offered me for this second book was £50 down on account of a 15 per cent. royalty. I received the money, but as no further payments were ever made I presume that the sales did not reach a satisfactory figure. Yet, once more the reviews were certainly all that could be desired.

My third effort, written in the following year, was an ordinary "society" novel. Presumably, it was very ordinary indeed, as seventeen publishers in succession declined it. Only one of this number, Messrs. Arrowsmith, had anything to say about it, and this was that their reader had been "amused." As this achievement seemed scarcely worth striving for, I burned the manuscript, and enjoyed a brief rest from my literary labours. A few months later, at the beginning of 1903, I felt sufficiently refreshed to complete another novel. Although the scheme was somewhat ambitious, its merits evidently failed to impress the publishing world, since fifteen firms refused it. Nothing daunted, I then re-wrote the book and sent it to a second literary agent, who, according to his advertisement, devoted "special attention to the work of new authors." Possibly I was too "new." At any rate, after paying Mr. Agent a guinea for his good offices and waiting in hopeful anticipation for several months the typescript came back to me like a boomerang. Thereupon, I revised it again, and submitted it to four other publishers, on my own account. From Messrs. Constable alone among these I had a word of encouragement, but nothing more. However, there was still one publisher left in London. This was the firm of Messrs. —, to whom the volume was duly submitted. As I heard nothing about it for more than twelve months I then concluded that I was never likely to do so, and accordingly applied myself to the writing of a fifth novel.

This time I thought I would give the Army a turn, and accordingly produced a story of a military nature, with a gallant young hero performing desperate deeds on every page, and sentiment oozing from each paragraph. It seemed, however, that my military novels were not going to prove more successful than my society ones. At any rate, ten firms declined the opportunity of bringing it out. With, however, the eleventh firm to which it was submitted, the luck changed, as this one accepted it on a 15 per cent. royalty. Unfortunately, however, for my high hopes of deriving a large profit from the book, the firm happened to be insolvent at the time the agreement was made. At any rate, when I applied for payment I was blandly referred to the liquidator. After considerable difficulty and a long delay I eventually extracted about £16 from this source. The story, however, had been so well reviewed that the Sheffield Weekly Telegraph gave me ten guineas for the remaining rights, and brought out a cheap paper-covered edition. Of the original six shillings edition no copies are now left, as the "Times Book Club" recently bought up the entire unsold stock as a "remainder." This important work is now, accordingly, out of print. Consequently, readers who want a literary feast will have to go to the British Museum.

At the commencement of 1905 I had completed my sixth novel. It ran to over 100,000 words, and struck me as being rather brilliant. The publishing world, however, evidently thought otherwise, as thirteen firms declined the chance of bringing it out. Thereupon I began (despite an encouraging criticism from Messrs. Hutchinson) to lose faith in its brilliancy myself. However, I sent it off to Messrs. —. Here it met with prompt acceptance, the terms offered being a payment of £20 on publication, and a further £10 on a sale of 750 copies. Without undue boasting I think I may fairly say that the book "caught on," for it was out of print in three months, and a sixpenny edition issued a few months later also achieved a similar result. The reviews, too, were so laudatory that, as in the case of my first book, several magazine editors promptly commissioned me to write articles and stories for them. Altogether, I netted over £70 from this source.

Having made something of a success with a theatrical novel, I wrote a second one. The agent to whom it was confided sold it to Messrs. —, charging me 10 per cent. for doing what I could very well have done without his assistance. However, I wanted to be saved the trouble of hawking the MS. round London. The terms arranged were £30 for all rights. Apparently, this book, like its predecessor, also did well, for it went out of print in a little over three months.

The Stage as a source of inspiration being temporarily exhausted, I now returned to an earlier love and wrote another military novel. When five publishers refused it, I began to take a dislike to the MS., and accordingly placed it in the hands of an agent. This expert submitted it to seven more firms without success, and then received an offer from Messrs. —. I accepted it, if only for the reason that when I myself had sent the book to that house a few months earlier it had been declined. The terms arranged were a payment of £25, on account of a 10 per cent. royalty. So far, the said royalties have proved an illusion, as at present—just a year after publication—they have not materialised. It would appear, therefore, that if I have not made a fortune out of Messrs. —, they have certainly not made one out of me.

With eight books to my name I now began to think that it was high time I made a little money out of my literary output. Accordingly, when at the beginning of 1907 my ninth work was ready for an expectant world I cast about for a firm with more liberal views on the subject of payment to authors. I did not, however, meet with much success, as seven publishers were so blind to their own interests as to refuse the novel on any terms at all. Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., however, wrote me a most encouraging letter explaining why this particular work (a society novel) did not suit them, and asking to see a second effort. The eighth firm, Messrs. —, however, proved less exigent, as they brought out the book on a 17½ per cent. royalty, and paid me £40 down. Shortly afterwards I received about £8 extra, derived for the most part from the sale of 500 copies to a Colonial publisher anxious to acquire superior fiction at a cheap rate.

My tenth effort was commissioned by a newly started publishing house, the terms being precisely the same as those just mentioned. I did not, however, do so well out of it, as, after a preliminary payment of £40, nothing more ever came to me. According to the statement of account delivered six months after publication, the total sales were about 1,200 copies. A Colonial edition, however, is in preparation, and time may yet show that there is a huge public awaiting me across the seas.

Still, in my despondent moments, I rather doubt it.

Just after this last work burst upon a comparatively unresponsive world I received a letter from Messrs. —, accepting a novel which I had submitted them more than a year earlier, and had long since forgotten. The terms were £30 on publication, to cover a sale of 800 copies, with additional payments of £10 on the sale of each subsequent 300 copies. As this particular book had been not only once declined by Messrs. — altogether, but also by twenty-four other firms, as well as being returned by an agent with the remark that it was quite "unsaleable," I naturally accepted the offer. Up to date the number of copies sold has been somewhere about 900.

My next novel, the tenth I had written, was also commissioned, and therefore did not entail the trouble of finding a home. The firm with which I now dealt was that of Messrs. —. Presumably, they had a certain amount of faith in me, for they invited me to write them a novel of not less than 60,000 words, undertaking to pay £50 on delivery of the manuscript, as well as the usual royalty. Inspired by this offer, I set to work briskly and in due time produced a book. As I wished to give plenty of value I made it 90,000 words in length. Before despatching it, however, I thought I would try to dispose of the serial rights. Accordingly, and without any hope of success, I sent the manuscript off to The Sheffield Weekly Telegraph. Within a week I received and accepted an offer of £100 from this source.

It used to be a theory of mine that, after one had published, say, half a dozen books, there would be no difficulty in getting all one's future work not only taken up without hesitation, but also handsomely paid for. Experience, however, has not borne out this comforting theory. At any rate, although my name appears on the cover of ten volumes, I still have one book on my hands which I wrote last year and for which I can get no offer of any shape, sort, size, or description whatever from any publisher in London. Indeed, only a single firm appears even to have nibbled at it. Their comment was as follows: "Very well written, and quite worth publishing. Unfortunately, we fear it would give pain to the theatrical profession." This does not strike me as an entirely sufficient reason for declining a book that is thus certified to be "very well written, and quite worth publishing." However, there it is, and the masterpiece accordingly remains on my hands. If anybody still wants it I am prepared to let it go for a £5 note.

In the course of my adventures among the publishers I have had some rather curious experiences; and the more I have seen of their methods the more I have felt inclined to marvel at them. On one occasion, for example, I received a letter from the head of a certain firm, saying that he was "interested" in a new book of mine, and asking me to write him one in the same style. I replied that it would have been more to the point if he had shown the "interest" he now professed by accepting the book when I sent it to him six months earlier. This view of the case, however, elicited no response. When the same thing happened a second time, about a year later, a suspicion began to force itself upon me that the manuscripts submitted to this particular house did not meet with quite the consideration to which they were entitled.

On another occasion a publisher who had brought out a novel of mine asked me to call and see him with a view to discussing terms for a second. After some little preliminary talk on the subject, he heaved a plaintive sigh and then remarked, "You will be sorry to hear that I did not make much more money than you out of your last novel." When I had recovered somewhat from the first shock of this announcement, I inquired why, considering he had not written it, he should imagine he was entitled to make even as much. Thereupon he cast a pitying glance at me and observed in withering accents, "My dear sir, you are talking like a novice."

Of course, this may have been the case. Still, I fail to see it.

The average publisher dearly loves to pose as a patron of letters. Yet, despite all their fine talk about encouraging beginners, I firmly believe that it is almost easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a young author to get a first book taken up solely on its merits, and to make money out of it. He will receive plenty of offers to print it at his own expense—even the leading houses dabble in this sort of business—but he will be particularly lucky to find a firm who will take the risk and pay him enough to meet the cost of his typewriting bill. Indeed, the senior partner of one big firm was, the other day, quite candid to me on this point. "Unless a man is well known and has made his name as a novelist, it is no good," he said, "for him to bring us a book. We don't want it. When he has made a reputation, let him come to us." This is all very well. Yet the policy seems a short-sighted one, for, if authors are to wait until they have first made a reputation they will never get their books published at all. When, however, I expressed this view, my informant merely shrugged his shoulders and murmured something about the impossibility of arguing with people who did not understand "business."

Such, then, is the tale of my achievement in the direction of book-writing as a means of a livelihood. And what does it all amount to? Nothing very encouraging, I am afraid. In ten years' time I have had ten books published. While no single one of them can be accounted a failure, and several have enjoyed quite respectable sales, yet the financial profit to myself has been less than £500. Surely, this is a poor result. The same amount of industry and brain expenditure applied to almost any form of commercial pursuit would probably have brought me twenty times as much money. In moments of expansiveness my publishers attempt to console me with the assurance that I have also acquired Fame.

Well, I could do without it.

This, then, is why, after due reflection, I have decided to give up novel writing and to devote the remainder of my life to keeping ducks in the country.

DODGE

IN THE ACADEMY (May 15th) I suggested that E. dodge represented a F. douger, "to stumble slightly" (of a horse), recorded by Palsgrave and Cotgrave.

Mr. Mayhew (ACADEMY, May 22nd) rejects this etymology on the grounds that a Northern dialect variant of dodge is dadge, and that F. douger would give dudge. He does not attack the semantic arguments I put forward, so I will confine myself to the phonetic objections. If dodge is the original form and dodge a dialect variant (cf. dialect catch for catch), my conjecture is obviously all wrong. But, as dodge is the only literary form, it is much more likely that dodge is the variant. Also, from the examples in the E.D.D., it is by no means clear that the dialect dodge (dadge), apparently "to saunter aimlessly," has anything to do with dodge, "to waver," and, later, "to evade." It is quite true that Mod. F. ou corresponds regularly to E. u; but the examples quoted by Mr. Mayhew are, I think, all words which occur early in the language, and show the regular Norman u for O.F. o, later ou. A less normal development might occur in the case of a word which is only recorded late in the sixteenth century. I do not, however, think that Palsgrave's douger is a correct form, and I quite agree with Mr. Mayhew that it can hardly be connected with O.F. dougié, delicate. Palsgrave's spelling is notoriously eccentric, but I do not think that he invents words. His douger is probably his own, or his printer's, mistake for some O.F. word recorded, if at all, in another form. Godefroy has a verb doquier, dokier, "se dresser, en parlant d'un cheval" (?), in a passage which I do not quite understand:

Puis r'a une lanche empoignie,
Mais chilz a cui il doit joster
Si consillier li vont loer
Qu'il voit doquier au chevalier
Bien puet parmi lui tresbuchier.
Ensi a chelui cangeroit,
Millour cheval u mont n'avoit;
Et chilz dist que bien le fera.
Atant cascuns lance empuingna,
Et lor viennent tout abrievé;
Chilz a son cheval surmené
Qu'il le cuida faire dokier.
Onques ne li puet adrechier,
Li chevalz au traviens aloit.

(Sones de Nansay, M.S. Turin).

I think these lines are corrupt, but it is clear that doquier refers to some swerving or dodging manoeuvre of a very artful kind. The text is obviously from a Picard or Walloon original, and the F. form of doquier would be dochier*. We have E. grudge for older grutch (O.F. grouchier), and I think it possible that dodge may represent an older dotch* and Palsgrave's douger be a misty recollection of docher*. This is, I admit, very conjectural. As to this O.F. doquier I suggest that it represents O.Du. docken, given by Kilian as a variant of duycken, "to duck." Cf. G. ducken, and Duckmäuser, an artful dodger, spelt Dockmäuser by Hans Sachs (Kluge). In Binnart's Biglotton (1676) duycken is glossed "latebre, delitescere, abdere se, latebras quærere, diverticula quærere," the last of which might very well be rendered dodge.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES SOCIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

At the rooms of the Sociological Society, 24 Buckingham Street, W.C., on May 24th, Mr. R. H. Tawney, of Balliol College, Oxford, read a paper on the Theory of Pauperism, Dr. C. S. Loch presiding. The lecturer analysed the doctrines laid down in the Report of the 1834 Poor Law Commission, pointing out the significance of the Commissioners' assumption that distress was not due to industrial causes, but to defects of individual character worked upon by a bad system of relief administration. He contrasted this with the admissions of the majority of the recent Poor Law Commission, noting that out of the 670 pages of the Report no fewer than 136 were given up to an analysis of the industrial causes of distress: an analysis such as we looked for in vain in the Report of 1834. To the earlier Commissioners, poor law relief was merely an administrative problem. They aimed at making relief unattractive and ineligible, and in so far as the existing poor law system had any philosophical basis at all, that basis was the leading doctrine of the 1834 Report; yet the proposition that distress was due to personal causes was almost as untrue in 1834 as we know it to be to-day. The lecturer characterised the conception underlying the Report of 1834 and the present system as a gigantic historical blunder. Proceeding to examine the main conclusions of the Majority and Minority on the last Commission, the lecturer stated that he had been led to prefer the findings and recommendations of the Minority.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTES ON SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Recent texts of the plays lend the weight of their authority to perpetuate what I believe to be erroneous decisions of former editors, this in cases where the correct reading or meaning is reasonably obvious. The following summaries of textual criticism are respectfully submitted for whatever value they may have by way of illustration:

Romeo and Juliet, I. i. 88-9.

Rebellious subjects, enemies to peace,
Profaners of this neighbor-stained steel.

May not "of" be understood to signify in consequence of, though, as in "What shall become of this?" (Much Ado, IV. i. 211)?

Romeo and Juliet, I. i. 234-5.

'Tis the way
To call hers, exquisite, in question more.

I believe we have here a characteristic Shakespearean play upon words. "Question," from quaerere, to seek; "exquisite," from "ex" (out) and quaerere. Thus we have "exquisite" contrasted with "in question."

Romeo and Juliet, I. ii. 101-2.

But in that chrysal scales let there be weigh'd
Your lady's love against some other maid.

I do not think this means, as Clarke suggests: "Let there be weighed the little love your lady bears you against the charms of some other maid." We are not told that she bears him any love at all. But, considering her love as a thing in supposition, and estimating the desirableness of it, could it be won, we may understand "Let there be weighed the value of your lady's love against the value of the love of some other maid."

Romeo and Juliet, III. iii. 26.

hath rusht aside the Law.
(Folio.)

Instead of "rusht," I believe we should read thrust, the error, for the most part, being explained by the theory of absorption. The th of thrust was absorbed in the preceding "hath," the mis-hearing of the compositor who set up from dictation further changing hath thrust into "hath rusht."

Romeo and Juliet, IV. iii. 28-29.

It occurs to Juliet that the sleeping potion may in reality be poison, administered by the friar to put her out of the way, but she repels the thought by reasoning—and yet, methinks, it should not,

For he hath still been tried a holy man.
(Second Quarto Folios.)

In the First Quarto we find Juliet moralising as follows:

Ah, I wrong him much,
He is a holy and religious man:
I will not entertain so bad a thought.

Steevens, followed by many editors, constructed a text by adding to the revised version of the Second Quarto and Folios the last line of the First Quarto, reading:

and yet, methinks, it should not,
for he hath still been tried a holy man:
I will not entertain so bad a thought.

In the First Quarto the consideration leading to the rejection of the thought of poison is one of morality—it is wrong to suspect the friar; in the subsequent Quarto and Folios, however, the consideration is one of pure reason—the suspicion is rejected because it is not consistent with the proven character of the friar. In the text composed of the reasoning later version and the closing line of the moralising First Quarto version we have a confusion of thought which must be apparent at a glance. Juliet's mind is keyed up to such a pitch of desperation that the ethical point of view—the sentiment of right and wrong—is entirely out of place, and the instinct of self-preservation is in full control. The evidences of careful revision in this instance are so unmistakable that there would appear to be no justification for making up a text.

Romeo and Juliet, V. iii. 170.

This is thy sheath [stabs herself]; there rust, and let me die.
(Globe.)

The First Quarto reading is—

Rest in my bosom, thus I come to thee.
[She stabs herself and falls.]

The other Quartos and the Folios read "rust" (practically as in Globe).

Even without the strong support which "rest" of the First Quarto lends to the conjecture that "rust" is a misprint, I think there is good cause for so regarding it. Dyce properly says, "... at such a moment the thoughts of Juliet were not likely to wander away to the future rusting of the dagger. . . ."

For the fleeting moment that Juliet has at her command she will keep in her heart the means of death furnished by her dead lover. She knew that discovery was near at hand, and feared that delay would frustrate her purpose—"yea, noise, then I'll be brief." (L. 169.) It would be impossible that she should think the dagger would be permitted to rust in her bosom, however truly she might say "Here rest," as indicating that she did not care to withdraw it after the thrust. For the dagger to rust would require some time, but "rest" could be true of even a moment, that moment being subject to her control.

Julius Caesar, I. ii. 154-5.

When could they say (till now) that talk'd of Rome,
That her wide Walkes incompart but one man?

Rowe changed "walks" of the Folio to walls. Discussion has dealt only with the literal meaning of "walks," but it seems to me that "wide walks" has a larger significance, and that we should understand that the poet refers to spheres of action. Neither "walks" nor "walls," in the usual sense, could fairly be said to encompass Rome's greatest man. Much of Caesar's life was spent abroad in conducting the enterprises in which the Roman power was engaged, and therefore outside the walls of Rome.

And he shall wear his crown by sea and land,
In every place, save here in Italy.

(I. iii.)

"Wide walks" gives this idea of far-reaching spheres of activity, encompassing the military and administrative genius of the Romans.

Julius Caesar, I. iii. 126-130.

for now this fearefull Night,
There is no stirre, or walking in the streetes;
And the Complexion of the Element
Is Favors, like the Worke we haue in hand,
Most bloodie, fierie, and most terrible.

(Folio.)

Omitting "like the work we have in hand," which is virtually parenthetical, we have the clear statement—

And the complexion of the element (sky)
Is favours (appearances) . . .
Most bloody, fiery, and most terrible.

the last line modifying "favours," the predicate. No emendation for "Is favours" is necessary.

Twelfth Night, I. v. 219.

Tell me your mind: I am a messenger.

Viola has met with opposition from Olivia's attendants, and with seeming reluctance on the part of the lady herself to grant an interview. As Viola has a message to deliver she now says, in effect, "Tell me your mind as to your willingness or unwillingness to hear the message that I bring." As the message has not been delivered, the request cannot be for an expression of Olivia's opinion of the message. Olivia's reply is proof, if any be needed, that this is the right explanation:

"Sure, you have some hideous matter to deliver, when the courtesy of it is so fearful. Speak your office."

Olivia tells her mind, that is, expresses her willingness to hear what Viola has to say.

Twelfth Night, I. v. 251-3.
but we will draw the curtain and show you the picture. Look you, sir, such a one I was this present: is't not well done? [Unveiling.]

Rightly to understand the words "such a one I was this present," I think we have only to construe them as the usual formula for exhibiting one's own portrait. If in later years Olivia were to draw the curtain and show her portrait when a young woman, we should expect her to say, "Such a one I was in my youth." Now, playfully using this form of expression, she says, "Such a one I was—this present."

Winter's Tale, I. ii. 74-5.
The imposition clear'd

Hereditary ours.

Warburton explains: "That is, setting aside original sin: bating the imposition from our first parents, we might have boldly protested our innocence to Heaven."

But it was not original sin that Polixenes was disclaiming for himself and Leontes. He makes the plain distinction between hereditary (original) sin and that which might have been of their own commission. Warburton confuses the thought in stating "imposition from the offence of our first parents." It is not original sin that constitutes the imposition, but the sins, if any, committed by Polixenes and Leontes, these sins being imposed upon original sin. I should read—

"The imposition cleared (the adding to, imposing of anything upon, original sin having been cleared by our boldly answering 'Not guilty') hereditary ours (only the sin which was hereditary could be imputed to us)."

Winter's Tale, I. ii. 146-50.

POL. What means Sicilia?
HER. He something seems unsettled.
POL. How, my Lord?
LEO. What cheer? how is't with you, best Brother?
HER. You look as if you held a brow of much distraction.
Are you mov'd (my Lord?)

(Folio.)

The Folio reading is manifestly wrong, and Hamner's suggestion that the line, "What cheer? how is't with you, best brother?" belongs to Polixenes, instead of to Leontes, has been followed by nearly all the modern editors. It seems, however, to have been overlooked that there is a further confusion in the distribution of the speeches quoted above, and that a portion of this line ("What cheer?") and the preceding words, "How, my lord!" should be given to Hermione, as a continuation of her speech, when she turns from Polixenes to express wifely solicitude for Leontes. "My lord" is her habitual expression in speaking of, or addressing, her husband (see lines 40, 61, 65, 87, and 150 in this scene and elsewhere in the play). The form of mutual address used by the two kings is "brother." Since the Folio distribution of the speeches in question is admittedly wrong, we should be guided in their rearrangement by the characteristic utterances of the speakers. It will be noticed that

How, my lord!
What cheer? how is't with you, best brother?

as usually assigned to Polixenes, contains two distinct addresses and inquiries—"How, my lord!" (first address); "What cheer?" (first inquiry); "How is't with you (second inquiry), best brother?" (second address)—in view of which fact and the characteristic utterances of the speakers, I should distribute the speeches as follows:

POL. What means Sicilia?
HER. He something seems unsettled.—How, my lord!
What cheer?
POL. How is't with you, best brother?
HER. You look as if you held a brow of much distraction:
Are you moved, my lord?

While recognising the propriety of restoring "How is't with you, best brother?" to Polixenes, there seems something incongruous in the two expressions "my lord" and "best brother," coming from one speaker, as in the arrangement suggested by Hamner, implying, as they do, different relations or character of intimacy, besides the fact that one of them is redundant.

Winter's Tale, I. ii. 157-8.

and so prove,

As ornaments oft do's, too dangerous.

May we understand "do's" as being a contraction of do us—"and so prove, as ornaments oft do (prove to) us, too dangerous"? The "us" includes the king among those to whom "ornaments" (an allusion to the queen) oft prove too dangerous.

Winter's Tale, V. i. 12.

LEO. Bred his hopes out of, true.

PAUL. Too true (my Lord).

Theobald gave the closing word of the king's speech, "true," to Paulina, in which he is followed by nearly all the modern editors. I think the change is uncalled for. The old dictatorial spirit of Leontes is gone, the Folio reading of this line giving us an insight into his changed character. Cleomenes, whose speech opens the scene, makes an assertion, beginning with—

Sir, you have done enough, and have perform'd which Leontes does not feel to be merited. In contrite refutation, the king speaks of the excellent qualities of his lost queen, and at the close turns to Paulina for sympathetic confirmation. Paulina's "Too true, my lord," is the proper reply (by intensified repetition) to the king's question—"True?" The only correction necessary in the Folio reading is to show "true," the closing word of the king's speech, as an interrogation.
A Saint-like sorrow:

Othello, I. i. 21.

A fellow almost damn'd in a fair wife;

Grant White rejected the theory of any allusion to Bianca, and she is the only woman named (and that in jest) as a possible wife of Cassio. If we take into consideration the circumstances leading up to the conversation between Iago and Roderigo, I think we need not be at a loss for the true meaning of the line. The marriage of Desdemona is the subject discussed. Among Cassio's supposed disqualifications it is not intended to include, according to Iago's evil thought, the fact that, in view of Othello's having a fair wife, it is unsafe to retain such a man as Michael Cassio in the close relation of lieutenant; that such a circumstance, in itself, is almost enough to damn him for the place?

The thought is perfectly characteristic of the speaker, and is quite after the poet's manner in thus early striking the keynote of the play. Iago proceeds later to work out the plot covering the supposed intrigue between Cassio and Desdemona, in the light of which this line, with the meaning here assigned, is very significant.

Othello, I. iii. 262-6.

Vouch with me Heaven, I therefore beg it not
To please the palate of my appetite;
Nor to comply with heat the young affects
In my defunct, and proper satisfaction,
But to be free, and bounteous to her mind.

(Folio.)

The "Globe" reading, which changes "my" to me, is the one most generally accepted, "In me defunct."

Othello first speaks for himself—

Vouch with me, Heaven, I therefore beg it not
To please the palate of my appetite,

then states his attitude towards his young wife—

Nor to comply with heat the young affects,
In my defunct and proper satisfaction,
But to be free and bounteous to her mind.

The "Nor" should have prevented the supposition that Othello was continuing to speak of himself, in case "young affects" presented any difficulty. Lines 264 and 266 seem clearly to refer to Desdemona: "Nor to comply with heat the young affects . . . But to be free and bounteous to her mind," the line "In my defunct and proper satisfaction" being parenthetical, and meaning "In the fact of my deadened or weakened capacity for personal satisfaction."

It seems incredible that these lines should have been a stumbling block to critics, beginning with Theobald. Those who retain "my" of the Folio give a wrong reason for doing so, and the correct reference of "young affects" is invariably missed.

Othello, IV. ii. 107.

DES. 'Tis meet I should be us'd so, very meet,
How have I been behav'd, that he might stick
The small'st opinion on my least misuse?

To explain this utterance as a protest is not in character, since the first line is thereby given a touch of irony, something far removed from Desdemona's nature. The entire speech is one of self-reproach. " 'Tis meet that I should be used so, very meet. How have I been behaved (my conduct in deceiving my father), that he (Othello) might stick the smallest opinion (favourable judgment, degree of credit or esteem) on my least misuse? " "How have I been behaved that even my least misconduct should merit any the smallest degree of indulgence on his part? "

As You Like It, II. i. 50.

Left and abandon'd of his velvet friend.

The indifference of a passing herd to the sufferings of one of their kind is touched upon later, but the present passage is distinct from the later one, and has an entirely different bearing. Recollecting the well-known habit of deer to go in couples, I believe that this line refers to the desertion, through fright, of her unfortunate companion by the doe. "Velvet," as descriptive of the soft coat of the female, and "friend," as indicating the attachment of the mate, are highly significant. The earlier usage of the word "friend" in this connection is, of course, undisputed.

Hammer's emendation, "friends," for the singular form of the Folio, seems unfortunate.

As You Like It, III. ii. 204-7.

Good my complexion! dost thou think, though
I am caparisoned like a man, I have a doublet and hose in my disposition?

While agreeing with Makone that "my complexion" here means "my female inquisitive disposition," critics stop short of recognising the application of the entire expression, "Good my complexion," to Celia. "Good" is here used without the name of the person addressed—"Good (Celia who art of) my complexion (a woman, and therefore of like impatience to learn such a love secret) dost thou think (that my present garb changes my disposition)?" "My complexion" takes the place of Celia understood, so that "Good my complexion" is the address. Rosalind cannot be supposed to express in the words just quoted the wish that her complexion (blushes) will not betray her, for Celia has already said, "Change you colour?" In any event, her love for Orlando is well known to her dearest friend, as she is aware. The indefinite manner, waving of the arms, in a stage position at some distance from Celia, with which some actresses utter these lines is amusing. It seems to me that one must imagine Rosalind, in a very fever of impatience, at close proximity, coaxing Celia to divulge the secret.

Love's Labour Lost, II. i. 45.

Well fitted in Arts, glorious in Armes.

The attempts to cure the defective rhythm of this line overlook the many proofs that the text was set up by hearing and not by seeing. I believe it is plain that as has been lost after "Arts":

A man of souveraigne parts he is esteem'd;
Well fitted in Arts, as glorious in Armes;

meaning, of course, "as (he is) glorious in arms."

Love's Labour Lost, V. i. 37-46.

ARM. Men of peace, well encountered.

HOL. Most military sir, salutation.

MOTH. [Aside to Costard.]

COST. [Aside in reply.]

MOTH. Peace! the peal begins.

In mock recognition of the military form of the exchange of courtesies between Armado and Holofernes, Moth, I believe, instead of the meaningless "peale" of the old copies, uses the word parle.

King Lear, III. vii. 59-65.

The sea, with such a storm as his bare head
In hell-black night endur'd, would have buoy'd up
And quench'd the stelled fires:

Yet, poor old heart, he help the heavens to rain.

If wolves had at thy gate howl'd that stern time,

Thou shouldst have said, "Good porter, turn the key,"

All cruels else subscrib'd:

The most difficult textual problem of the play has been said to lie in correctly answering the question, To what does "else" refer?

I should read, "All cruels (cruel things, agents of cruelty) else (other than the cruelty of that 'stern time') subscrib'd (forgiven)." The idea to be brought out is the extreme cruelty of the storm, which done by saying that every other form of cruelty in comparison, even that of wolves, at that "stern time" sank into insignificance, and that they were entitled as living creatures to shelter. Also, compare IV. vii. 36-8:

Mine enemy's dog,

Though he had bit me, should have stood that night Against my fire.

Which further conveys the idea that the ferocity of "that stern time" overtopped "All cruels else."

Regarding the question whether we should understand the address to the porter to be "Good porter, turn the key, All cruels else subscribe" (following Furness, and reading "subscribe" of the Folios), or take the address to be "Good porter, turn the key" (reading "subscrib'd" of the Quartos), as "else" would seem to refer to a part of Gloucester's speech ("that stern time") not included in the address to the porter, it would not seem proper to include in that address the line in which "else" occurs—"All cruels else subscrib'd."

EDWARD MERTON DEY.

BURNS'S POEMS FOR GERMAN STUDENTS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Mr. T. F. Henderson recently contributed a volume of "Selections from Burns" to a series of English works published at Heidelberg. He seems to have had many difficulties with his printers, and he gives a page of errata, which, however, does not nearly cover all the shortcomings in the book. This is particularly mentioned now because, from the state in which things are left, the student new to the subject seems likely enough to be perplexed over the form of the poet's name. Mr. Henderson is made to speak variously of "Burns's prose," of "Burn's Edinburgh publisher," and even (curiously enough) of Robert Aiken's "skilful elocution of Burns' M.S. poems." After the prevalent fashion, he provides the book with introduction, notes, and glossary, giving in all three sufficient reason for comment, apart altogether from the defective printing over which one stumbles at every turn. Being an antiquary and not a literary critic Mr. Henderson is disposed at all hazards to find such crude material as his author presumably, probably, or possibly utilised. This tendency, unfortunately, leads to various unnecessary and even irritating remarks. "Possibly suggested by an older song;" "c.f., 'The Piper o' Dundee';" "various verbal resemblances, accidental or not, to lines in other ways, have been pointed out"—these and similar observations, mainly superfluous under any circumstances, are surely altogether out of place in a compilation prepared for the academic use of the foreigner.

Besides his antiquarian bias, Mr. Henderson is deferential towards the memory of his coadjutor, the late Mr. W. E. Henley, and therefore he loyally does what in him lies to bring Burns down from his pride of place. In the essay with which he accompanied the Centenary Edition of the poet's works Mr. Henley thought it necessary to enlarge on the presumption that the man for whose literary bequest he had assumed sponsorship was, after all, only a peasant. Mr. Henderson in his introductory excursus consequently labours this point, strenuously assuring his Continental neophytes that "his humour is essentially peasant humour" and that "as a poet of Nature, also, Burns, on account of his peasantry, has a place of his own." Supporting the earlier of these contentions he quotes four similes bearing on rural life, and adds: "Such metaphors are quite a feature of his verse." But there is no need to go further than "Tam o'Shanter" for significant figures that are true for the whole range of humanity. There is, for example, the stern, waiting woman "gathering her brows like gathering storm"; there is the perfect summary of tipsy exuberance of feeling in the words, "Tam lo'd him like a vera brither"; there is the splendour of supreme and irresponsible individuality rolling through the line, "Kings may be blest, but Tam was glorious"; and there is the impressively picturesque and varied imagery of the familiar passage on pleasures. No doubt Burns was reared within a rustic environment—he was a peasant, if a farmer and gauger may rightly be called so—but it was not because of his social position that he had these superb visions and saw these genuine and abiding characters. It was the poet of imagination all compact, and not the plodding, ambitious, imitative peasant who compassed what Mr. Henderson calls metaphors, and also produced those descriptive touches which he patronisingly assigns to "his peasant mastery of Nature's idiosyncrasies." Surely anyone familiar with the country, whether gentle or simple, would be likely to notice what the critic says "could have been portrayed only by the imagination of a peasant." A nobleman with gun on his shoulder might have made all the remarks Mr. Henderson quotes for his purpose about hirplin' hares, blackening trains of crows, and such familiar denizens of the moorlands as pairtricks, gorcocks, curlews and plovers. It would not have surprised her friends had the lass of Ballochmyle referred to "restless rattons," "a wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower," and "winter hurtling through the air the roaring blast." Nor surely is there anything very remarkable, whether coming from the mouth of a peer or that of a ploughboy, in such statements as "The rising moon began to glower," and "The silent moon shone high o'er tower and tree," both of which, in Mr. Henderson's view, proclaim the peasant origin of Burns. There would be some suggestive confusion in genealogy if inferences regarding birth and upbringing were to be drawn from the allusions of English poets to the moon. Meanwhile, the compiler's German constituents seem likely enough, under his guidance, to form some very erroneous opinions regarding the powers of observation and expression possessed by the upper classes of the Scottish people. They will also be unfortunate if they should receive from their guide, as they may well do, the impression that Burns, instead of being, as he was, a strong, independent, and towering poetical exponent, was merely a ready and nimble wit with serviceable powers of adaptation. Above all, they will be miserably disappointed if they turn from him, as they may do after what they learn in these pages, to seek higher ridges of Parnassus in the company of Allan Ramsay, Hamilton of Gilbertfield, and Robert Fergusson.

While fairly exhaustive and generally accurate Mr. Henderson's glossary ignores points that will inevitably puzzle foreigners, while it includes some indefensible definitions. Students, it may be noted, are prone to commit explanations to memory and to take texts for granted. An army officer has been heard to say that in passing into his profession he disposed of "Macbeth" through his familiarity with the notes appended to the Clarendon Press Edition of the play. Avoiding Shakespeare, he had kept close to the commentator, the result being all that he fondly desired. Similarly, the German aspirant to English knowledge may absorb wholesale Mr. Henderson's information without troubling about his author. If so a statement early in the glossary may keenly stir his powers of philosophic speculation. "Be," Mr. Henderson succinctly avers, means "alone." If assimilated apart from the context, as it may be, this absolute pronouncement may have a decidedly moving influence. Burns, the ardent and impulsive learner may reflect, must have passed into subtle depths of thought in his interpretation of life, gripping in his own way the conclusion reached by Matthew Arnold when he said that "in the sea of life existed . . . We mortal millions live alone." So, with these accredited synonyms for use, he may advance to wrestle with Hamlet's "To be or not to be" and the Ancient Mariner's pathetic "Alone on a wide, wide sea." Thus Mr. Henderson may propel his followers towards an infinitely alluring and perilous quest, while simply attempting to explain the poet's appeal to Satan to "let poor bodies be." The fault of the glossarist in this instance lies in his regard for a prosaic literalism. As syntactical authorities could tell him, the complement here is inevitably wrapped up with its governing verb. The one cannot be defined without the other. Like the poet's cloud, the whole expression must move together if it move at all. Had he recognised this, the Editor might have avoided a foray into indefinite space and a prompting to wild flights of speculative metaphysics. Several other lapses are less easily explained away. Mr. Henderson may possibly have a defence in reserve for what he says of "brackens," "braik," and "clatter," but he can offer no excuse but one for the assertion that "cheep" means "to peep." Yet this is all the explanation that he vouchsafes regarding the statement in the lyric "To W. Creech," "He cheeps like a bewildered chicken." Mr. Henderson may not know that nestlings are often called "cheepers" by the adventurous boy who raids the spring hedges, otherwise he would have recognised that "cheep," which is a variant of chirp, has rare phonetic excellence. The definition "Hallan, a partition wall," provokes remark. It is too general, for a hallan is the particular partition which fronts a cottage doorway, and serves to make a hall. Various other interpretations—such as those given of "lick," "mim," "out-oure," "sonsie," and others—tempt one to linger, but a conclusion may be made with the definition given of "sumph." Mr. Henderson's view of a sumph is that he is "a churl." But the differences between the two characters are fundamental and decided. The churl, in spite of positive and negative blemishes and defects, may be a remarkably clever fellow, while the sumph is simply a dunce or blockhead. In his case, says the Shepherd of the Noctes Ambrosianae, there is "want o' sense, a want o' feelin'—in short, a want o' sow!—a deficit which nae painstakin' in education can ever supply." Thus he is one of the hopeless members of society, which cannot in all fairness be said the churl.

Had Mr. Henderson prepared his book for home use it would not have been necessary to draw attention here to its deficiencies in critical perception, its misleading suggestions, and the inaccuracies of its vocabulary. It seems imperative, however, on the part of everyone who respects English literature, and who is jealous for the reputation of its foremost representatives in the councils of the nations, to enter a strong protest when a manifest injustice is done among foreigners by one of ourselves. The German is not likely in any case to overrate English men of letters, but he should not be assisted towards depreciation by editorial labours applied in this country. Presumably he desires to study Burns at first hand with the aid of an expert, and it is surely the duty of the selected guide to set his author in the best light possible. While there is no need to eulogise beyond what is warranted, every sponsor should be absolutely fair, and he who undertakes to introduce Burns should find abundance to say of his merits without laboriously magnifying the faults he has in common with all mortals. He should not strive to show, against the practically unanimous opinion of the literary world, that his author has been generally over-estimated, and that his exceedingly partial compatriots have never been able to see the defects, the limitations of outlook, the initiative and adapting qualities which he and another have been sufficiently learned and acute to discover. To do this under any circumstances is a gratuitous and possibly a very injurious proceeding, but to do it with a foreign audience is to snatch an advantage where criticism with regulating hand cannot immediately follow. After all, as Matthew Arnold pointed out, the function of criticism is not to diminish an author's importance but to report the best that he has thought and said in his time and place. This is what concerns posterity in general, and it is this, above all, for which credit should be sought for a poet from nations other than his own. The inexpert foreigner cannot detect mere theories, and with these as the only pabulum available he naturally gratifies his appetite for knowledge. He has taken what he could get, and he may go through life believing that he has a final estimate, while he is cherishing the discredited argument of a special pleader. Such an unfortunate result is seriously aggravated when, as in the present case, it is not only poetical achievement that is at stake, but also a form of language over which the unwary are prone to stumble and meet disaster.

SCRUTATOR.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE ABROAD.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Our friends the enemy are never tired of pointing to the supposed triumphs of the experiment of Woman Suffrage out of England. Eminent politicians, who themselves helped to thrust the enfranchisement of women on their respective countries, appear on platforms and expatiate on the beneficent legislation and purification of political life that has resulted therefrom, and twit England with lagging behind. Apparently "White-robed Innocence" has descended to dwell in those fortunate spheres. Waiving the question that there can hardly be any true comparison between the kingdoms, dependencies, and states referred to—some of them small or thinly-populated, or with only parochial concerns—and a mighty country like England, with its huge Indian Empire—waiving this unassailable vantage-ground, the facts as to the success of Female Suffrage are either absurdly exaggerated or nonexistent.

We will start with a reference to New Zealand, which, as the first home, Colonially, of Female Suffrage, is perhaps the most frequently referred to. It is New Zealand which has been offering to send us Dreadnoughts and the Suffragists have not forgotten to remind us of that fact, but they say nothing of the circumstance that Female Suffrage in New Zealand has synchronised with a decline in the birth-rate, or as to the dubious way it was obtained, which, according to Mr. Harold Spender, in the Daily Chronicle for Sept. 7th, 1906, was "by the heroic policy of the wife of a prominent statesman in refusing to allow her husband to go to bed until he promised to give way on the question"—in other words, nagging him into it.

In the Times for August 18th, 1906, appeared an excellent letter, which is too long to give in full here, from Mrs. Emily Nicol, of Auckland, N.Z. In it she says: "For all the good Female Franchise has done New Zealand, the Motherland could very wisely let it alone. While it has certainly not improved politics, it has by no means improved the social status of women. Very much the contrary. The gallant chivalry of old has departed to give room to the numerous social disabilities we are enduring through the incoming of the vote. Whatever gain we may have had through legislation—and there is every reason to believe that that same gain would have been ours irrespective of the vote—has been more than counter-balanced by our loss socially, which has really made us largely the losers by the franchise—a loss many women in New Zealand are bitterly regretting to-day." She goes on to state, as so many others in the Colonies and America have done, that the women's vote fluctuates, that they mainly vote in large numbers only on some particular issue, such as Local Option, and that therefore the figures often given are fallacious. In conclusion, she says: "Although having taken the most active interest in connection with the franchise ever since its inception, and in a letter which I received from our deeply lamented Premier [i.e., Mr. Seddon] at the last election, he said I had little to learn in election matters. I would vote to-morrow for Female Franchise to be erased from our Statute Book."

In the United States of America there are four kinds of franchise: tax-paying suffrage; school suffrage; municipal suffrage; and full suffrage. In only one State—Kansas—is there municipal suffrage, and this has answered so badly that the people of the State absolutely refuse to enlarge it. Of the 46 States in the Union, twenty do not give women any form of ballot, and it must be remembered that they regard the bestowal of the ballot so lightly that in some of the States it is given to aliens who have been in the country only six months, and have merely declared their intention of becoming citizens.

Four States have the full suffrage—Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho, and Utah. In Utah the Mormon influence predominates, and in 1898, with the aid of the women's vote, a leading Mormon, Mr. Brigham Henry Roberts, who was possessed of three wives, was elected a member of the National House of Representatives. Under the pressure of strong popular resentment and indignation, which found expression all over the country, the House excluded him from its membership by a vote of 268 to 50. Another Utah Legislature, elected in part by women's votes, chose as United States Senator, Mr. Reed Smart, an apostle of the Mormon Church and a member of its Presidency. The Senate was flooded with petitions for his unseating.

Wyoming, after thirty years of Woman Suffrage, kept on its statute-books a law licensing gambling-houses and collecting a revenue from them for the public treasury. In Wyoming also, as Mr. Belfort Bax points out on p. 115 of "Essays in Socialism," every public office is filled by a woman, except, mark you, that of police-constable, and a man can perform no legal act without the consent of his wife, as also more recently in New Zealand. In addition, in Wyoming, the verdicts brought by the female juries against male offenders have been often of so vindictive a ferocity as to amount to a public scandal.

But it is the failure of Female Suffrage in Colorado which is the most glaring. Judge Moses Hallett, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Colorado, when the State was a Territory, said in an interview, as reported in the Denver Republican, of the 6th April: "If it were to be done over again the people of Colorado would defeat Woman Suffrage by an overwhelming majority." Another authority—Mrs. Caroline Corbin—says: "Instead of purifying politics, it has developed bribery from a casual incident to a wide-spread necessity."

In Denver, on one occasion, the women supported Mr. Shafroth, who was running on the Democratic ticket. In several districts they "swelled his vote" to such extraordinary proportions that it amounted to 90 per cent. of the total vote, and in some instances his majority exceeded the entire registered vote. How did they accomplish these wonders? They stole official ballots and "prepared" them in advance. They "padded" the polling lists and "stuffed" the ballot boxes. They bought votes and set gangs of personators—lady personators—in motion. Finally they organised and instituted disturbances at the polls to frighten timid voters away, and give opportunity to "stuff" the ballot boxes and "monkey" with the count. These things they not only plotted, but did, and when Mr. Shafroth was put in possession of the proofs of their activity, he refused to retain a seat in Congress secured by such deeds. The matter was investigated at Washington, and in a deposition made by Mrs. Beatrice Muhleman, formerly a clerk in the Colorado Legislature, she testified that she, in company with Miss Alma Beswick and a man named Grainger, procured 125 of the official ballots of Precinct I of District F. They took the ballots to the St. Nicholas Hotel, where they engaged a room, which was paid for by Miss Beswick. They pulled down the shades, closed the blinds, and locked the door, and then proceeded to "prepare" the ballots. The ballots were then numbered to correspond with numbers on the poll-list, and were thus made ready to be dumped into the ballot-boxes. Miss Beswick is given the credit for inventing a plan for disturbance at the polls in order to give opportunity for the dumping of the prepared ballots, and the names of several lady personators are mentioned.

Small wonder that a short while back we were informed that Republicans and Democrats in Colorado had alike agreed not to nominate any more women as candidates for the Legislature in that State, and to annul as soon as possible the Act of 1893 giving them votes, thus thrusting them back out of political life altogether. They have been found to be most fanatical partisans, to engage in faction fights, to have introduced hysterics into politics, and to be unable to take clear views of party politics or great issues.

In Norway and Finland, of course, female enfranchisement is very recent, though already a Bill is before the Norwegian Storting to legalise Adult Suffrage universally, thus putting female voters in a majority of about 60,000. In Finland 24 women already sit in the Diet, though our English Suffragists say they don't advocate female membership of Parliament. Among the Acts recently passed in Finland is one to raise "the age of consent," thus throwing more responsibility on men, and taking it away from women, a course liable to involve great injustice.

Altogether, we think sufficient has been said to show that Woman Suffrage is not the unqualified blessing in other places the Suffragists declare it to be.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
agd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

(4) OVER BRAVE BLUE SEAS

In his new work Mr. Will Brooke presents a realistic account of a sailor's life; his wanderings and adventures by land and sea from the time of his first voyage in a sailing vessel until he obtains command of an ocean-going steamship. The toil, the strife, the humour and pathos of life on the great waters are depicted in intensely vivid and striking language. A sailor by profession,
 Mr. Brooke has gifts of insight, imagination, observation and description that are usually associated only with the born storyteller.

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

" . . . He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible hitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chalonér believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thighed scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we knew what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chalonér goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horsehoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

"A fecund sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Colinda's mine in lemons rare—
That gem-bedeizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera.
Replete with costly hags and matrons fair!
His votaroes doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chalonér steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and hands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, ROANOKE RAPIDS, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spangl'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Grones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beklames whose slightest glance would fright a horse:
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chalonér to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE great Mr. St. Loe Strachey, who has introduced the cocked hat into journalism, is now endeavouring to introduce the same proud head-gear into the sphere of religion. In other words, Mr. Strachey and the Spectator have decided that the Order of Confirmation is a thing of no importance at all, at any rate when it comes to be compared with the circulation of the Spectator. The Spectator is largely read by Nonconformists, and one of these, a lady, has written to complain that the vicar of the parish in which she resides has refused to admit her to Communion on the ground that she has not been confirmed. Here is the Rubric in the Prayer Book at the end of the Order of Confirmation: "And there shall be none admitted to Holy Communion, until such time as he be confirmed, or be ready and desirous to be confirmed." The lady in question has not been confirmed, and has no intention of being confirmed. Consequently, the vicar had no power or right to admit her to Communion, and her attempt to get up a grievance on the point is a piece of unblushing impudence. Mr. Strachey knows this just as well as we do, but rather than run the risk of hurting the feelings and losing the support of any of his numerous Nonconformist readers he throws over the authority of the Prayer Book and plainly states that "Worship in the National Church is free to all members of the nation, and such participation in its services includes the resort to the Communion for all baptized persons, provided only that they are not excluded by the Rubric which forbids resort to the Lord's Table to open and notorious evil livers." Which is as much as to say that Mr. Strachey arrogates to himself the right to pick and choose according to his own pleasure and fancy among the Rubrics, and to say this one is valid, but the other is not, and may be disregarded. It is high time that Mr. Strachey were made to realise that he has no such powers and no such authority. We hope he will be made to feel this in his tenderest part—namely, his circulation. A journal which for the sake of gain or to avoid possible loss flouts the laws of the Church and endeavours to undermine and bring contempt on her authority is not one which can commend itself to loyal churchmen. All such people who are readers of the Spectator should give Mr. Strachey clearly to understand that he will lose their support if he cannot make up his mind to draw some sort of line to his "broad-minded tolerance." All through the late education controversy the Spectator supported the enemies of the Church, and it has now got to the pitch of saying practically that there is no church at all in the spiritual sense, and that it really makes no difference whether a man conforms or not. This is a despicable creed, but it is also a dangerous and deadly creed, and a paper which is using all its influence to promulgate such ideas is a dangerous paper. Mr. Strachey has, of course, a perfect right to his own views as to the best methods of building up and maintaining a large circulation, but he has no right to pose as a loyal churchman and to claim loyal churchmanship for the Spectator while he is spreading his subversive and insidious doctrines. If Mr. Strachey is a Freethinker or a Nonconformist, and if the Spectator is to be run on Freethinking or Nonconformist lines, let him say so flatly and frankly. He cannot have it both ways.

For now the poet cannot die,
And leave his music as of old,
But o'er him ere he yet be cold Begins the scandal and the cry.

Thus Tennyson in the black mood. The scandal and the cry, however, would appear to be over and done. What we do now is to rush in with ridiculous memories and fatuous reminiscences. Swinburne, our beautiful gossip and chronicler of small beer have managed to forego. He would never permit them to know him in anything like an intimate way; consequently details as to his preference for strawberry jam and the colour of his bath gown have been spared us. With Meredith, unfortunately, it has not been so. In his later years Meredith became a very human and fatherly old gentleman, and allowed himself to succumb more than once to the blandishments of the Whitefriars Club. We do not remember that he ever graced the proceedings of that club by his presence. But he certainly did the next worst thing, which was to allow the club to come to him. The inevitable result is before us in the shape of "Some Memories of Meredith," by Claudius Clear, of the British Weekly:

On July 19th, 1900, the members of the Whitefriars Club, with many of their friends, had the rare pleasure and honour of being the guests of George Meredith at Box Hill. We lunched together in the hotel, and afterwards walked to the little cottage up through the smooth gravel path, and straight through the further garden, where the poet sat waiting for us. Admirable was the easy tact with which he managed to greet all the large and varied company of ladies and gentlemen. His quick eyes immediately singled out anyone who was in danger of being left out. I think the visitors were impressed by the noble head. . . . Equally were we struck by his conversation. Every single sentence was pointed and scintillating and characteristic. There was some little trouble in providing enough cups for all the invading party; we had been discussing some trouble then brewing in the East, and Mr. Meredith exclaimed, with a bright look: "I was just telling you there were troubles in China." I especially admired the deep and courteous interest he took in the different people who were presented to him. . . . I remember he discussed with the author a poem that had just appeared in one of the weekly papers. He seemed quite familiar with names and books which might have seemed not important enough for him to notice. A shy girl, overcome by the honour of actually beholding the author of the wonderful books in their dark blue covers, was beckoned by his imperious hand and told to sit next to him. He graciously gave permission for the party to visit the little summer-house where he wrote so many of his books. The literary pilgrims were made to feel that they were conferring an honour upon him by their presence. . . . Mr. Swinburne at his own table and in his own house was a model of courtesy, but he did not seem to show any special knowledge of his guests. He took them as guests, and therefore entitled to the best that he could give them. Meredith had all Swinburne's courtesy, but he had the graceful and lovable art of making the humblest author feel that he knew him in his works, and was individually interested in him. Swinburne was a great reader of the newspapers, and was aware even of little things in contemporary literature, but I fancy Meredith far surpassed him in this, and he had also the art of recalling his knowledge, and the kindness to use it.

Fancy that now! Imagine "all the large and varied company of ladies and gentlemen" with Shorter leading on. Think of the visitors being impressed by "the noble head"; and consider the "bright look" with which Meredith must have said: "I was just telling you there were troubles in China," when a cup was smashed. And think how nice it is of Dr. Robertson Nicoll to admire, "especially" the "deep and courteous interest" which Meredith took in the different people who were presented to him, and how wonderful it was that a shy girl should be beckoned by his imperious hand and told to sit next to him. It is a thousand pities that Dr. Robertson Nicoll did not publish these exquisite memories in Mr. Meredith's lifetime; for we rather fancy that if he had the Whitefriars Club would have been made the subject of a few lines of Meredithese, which would have served to crumple it up for at least a fortnight. We can assure Dr. Robertson Nicoll that, in spite of what he was made to feel, the visit of all the large and varied company of ladies and gentlemen to George Meredith conferred about as little honour upon him as Claudius Clear's crapulous account of the proceedings now for the first time published.

Of course, we quite recognise that Claudius has simply been doing his best to be interesting. The fact that he succeeds in being merely silly, is, perhaps, not his fault. Evidently he has a great memory for small things, and no memory at all for larger things. He remembers, for example, that the visitors were "struck" by George Meredith's conversation, and that "every single sentence was pointed and scintillating and characteristic"; yet he remembers none of the sentences themselves, and fobbs us off with the barely permissible persiflage about troubles in China, which is neither pointed, scintillating, nor characteristic. Of course, a great man in his garden chair, with a crowd of fearful and wonderful ladies and gentlemen from the Whitefriars Club bobbing and scraping round him, cannot be quite at his best. The pity of it is that a journalistic member of "the large and varied company of ladies and gentlemen" should fail to perceive that a man's privacy is his privacy, and that you have no real business to print after his death what you would have deemed it indiscreet to have printed during his lifetime. We note, further, that Dr. Robertson Nicoll professes to have a knowledge of Mr. Swinburne "at his own table and in his own house." And we note with infinite satisfaction that when Dr. Nicoll or his informant was at Mr. Swinburne's table Mr. Swinburne managed to treat him "as if he had no special knowledge" of him.

However, in the next column Claudius manages to tell us something which is interesting, if Claudius has remembered it rightly. He says that Meredith told him that one of his favourite passages in poetry was the following lines from "In Memoriam," and that he, Claudius, "will never forget the vehement emphasis" which Meredith laid on the lines italicised:

Be near me when my light is low,
When the blood creeps, and the nerves prick
And tingle; and the heart is sick,
And all the wheels of Being slow.

Be near me when the sensuous frame
Is rack'd with pangs that conquer trust;
And Time, a maniac scattering dust,
And Life, a fury slinging flame.

Be near me when my faith is dry,
And men the flies of latter spring,
That lay their eggs, and sting and sing
And weave their petty cells and die.

Be near me when I fade away,
To point the term of human strife,
And on the low, dark verge of life
The twilight of eternal day.

"The last quotation," adds Claudius, "led him to talk about personal immortality":

"You believe in it?" he said. "But for my part I cannot conceive it. Which personality is it which endures? I was one man in youth and another man in middle age." He then moved his stick in the ground and said, "I have been this and this and this. Which is it that is immortal?" I ventured to remind him of what John Stuart Mill said about the persistence of the ego. He said, with some vehemence, "I do not feel it. I have never felt it. I have never felt the unity of personality running through my life. I have been"—this with a smile—"I have been six different men: six at least. No," he said, "I cannot conceive personal immortality."

The English Review for June contains the usual batch of poetry. We are glad that the editor is doing his best to bring together some printable verses month by month, though we cannot always congratulate him on his taste. For example he prints four poems by John Galsworthy, one of which contains the following lines:

The sea joins Heaven,
This green turf joins the sea
From dawn till even
The sun, the grass and we!

Marvellous! Particularly as the note of exclamation after "we!" is the poet's own. Not satisfied with this much, he gives us another strophe:

The southern wind-drift
Shepherds her flocks of scum,
And squanders, spendthrift,
Her fragrance and her hum.

"Scum" and "hum" are really beautiful when you come to think of them. We are inclined, on the whole, however, to suggest that if Mr. Galsworthy cannot do better than this, he had better stick to his Suffragist fiction-writing. Another poet of the English Review is a gentleman of the name of Ezra Pound. His verses have all the appearance of having been written by Melchizidek Hundredweight. They begin in the manner of Mr. Crowley:

Damn it all! all this our South stinks peace, which is pretty fair for a beginning. Mr. Pound evidently desires to appropriate for himself what is left of the mantle of Robert Browning. At the same time he forgets that there is a good deal more in Browning than mere ejaculation and eccentricity of interjection.

For the rest we chronicle with some satisfaction that the English Review has actually gone the length of publishing a sort of impressional essay which will make the Suffragists cry "pshaw." The paper in question is by a Miss (or is it Mrs.?) Olive Garnett, and while in places it comes dangerously near mawkishness, we think that on the whole it is to be preferred to the saw-tooth utterances of the average raspy advanced female, and we are glad that the editor of the English Review has had the pluck to print it. We could wish, however, that he had softened down the author's expressions of admiration for beards and male ears with "faint down" on them. On the other hand, as she assures us that she "knows" that "happy married life is the crowning aim and glory of the average woman's existence," we must forgive her, and hope that she may never fall into the clutches of the scraggy sporters of the mauve, white and green.

The Book Monthly is concerned about what it calls "the novel crisis." And the editor has written round to various popular writers for their opinion of the sevenpenny novel. Naturally, he has received many novel replies, which, of course, he prints. One gentleman airs himself in the following strain: "I am glad you have written to me on the question of the price of novels as it is one on which I hold strong views." We should think so. Another novelist—a Baroness, by the way—feels, if you please, that "the author is the last person in the world to judge of the price at which a novel should be retailed to the public." There is humility for you. Of course, if your popular author can sell a novel out and out for say a thousand pounds, the price at which it should be retailed is perhaps no great matter from the author's point of view. But when it comes to the favourite single hundred pounds on account of a fifteen per cent. royalty, there is something to be said for deliberation. A sevenpenny copyright novel of the length of the ordinary six-shilling novel cannot in the nature of things be made to pay, unless the author's enormous sales are a fact and not a simple figment of the aspiration. And authors who are of opinion that the sevenpenny novel will not injure the sale of their six-shilling volumes have only got to wait to discover the truth. In certain circumstances cheap editions may improve an author's sales for the time being; but sooner or later they are bound to injure him most seriously. People will not pay six shillings for what they may reasonably hope to obtain for sevenpence without much real waiting. In all these movements for the cheapening of literature good, bad or indifferent, one cannot trace the smallest desire on the part of anybody to better the condition of the author; for when benefits are to be reaped it is the publisher and the public who are to reap them, and the author who is to be sacrificed at the harvest festival. We should advise authors who have the smallest regard for their own interests to hold out steadfastly against further blandishments of the cheap literature-mongers. When you write from seventy-five to one hundred thousand words on the off-chance of getting a remote fifty pounds for your labour, you are committing the unpardonable sin, no matter how bad an author you may be. There are numbers of novels published at six shillings which have been bought out and out for under fifty pounds. A reduction of the standard price to two shillings or two and sixpence, with publication at sevenpence after two years, would mean that the publishers pay the author less and less for his work when it is bought out and out, and make smaller and smaller advances when publication is on the royalty basis. The two-shilling novel is not yet definitely decided upon; for all that certain publishers are already making its possible advent an excuse for small purchase money and small advances on account. Practically the game is in the hands of the authors, if they will only have the sense to play it.

SONNET

From the French of Ferdinand de Gramont.

ALL are not born for facile ways, to tread
Roads trod by every foot; the Lord did frame
Those sojourners in the wilderness that claim
Free airs, and pathways to the mountain-head.
Wild hearts, the city they condemn; instead
They drink the torrent, the woods' tent of green
And living roof of heaven their only screen;
The shadow of a yoke their free brows dread.

Halted all day on some high mountain-crest,
Upon the cup of solitude they feed,
And though far men murmur at their pursuit,
The Lord hath said: "Let no man them molest.
Mine is their exile, sterile or full of fruit,
And from the bit their reinless necks I freed."

M. JOURDAIN.

THE GOOSE-BOY

I DRIVE the geese along lush holms,
Through the sombre fen;
No hind I meet nor maiden sweet
To bid good-den:
The louring clouds have over-blown
Eve's western flare,
But sad and low a dying glow
Yet lingers there.

One doleful blast, as I plod on,
Distant and harsh
From swine-herd's horn is faintly borne
Across the marsh.
Back to the lonely grange I drive
My master's geese;
And still do pray that after day
Night shall bring peace.

COCOA AND THE CENSOR

THE Nation has hastened to the rescue of Mr. George Bernard Shaw. The Nation, as our readers may not be aware, is a sixpenny review, edited by Mr. Massingham, formerly of the Daily Chronicle, and is understood to be financed by a Mr. Rowntree, who, if we mistake not, is a Quaker, and manufactures excellent chocolate at York. We take it that Mr. Massingham is a Nonconformist and a Liberal and a Suffragist and all the rest of it. The third party to the transaction with which we are about to deal is Mr. Shaw himself, who, according to his own showing, is a Bible-smasher and a Socialist, not to say a concocter of melodramas. Mr. Shaw has written what he is pleased to call a crude melodrama, and we learnt last week that the licenser of plays had refused to permit this melodrama publicly to be performed. It now transpires that the licenser of plays passed Mr. Shaw's melodrama in the crude or cocoa-berry lump, but desired that certain doubtful ingredients should be removed. In plain words, Mr. Shaw has informed the Nation that Mr. Redford objected to two passages in the play. With reference to one of these passages, Mr. Shaw assures us that no difficulty could have occurred. According to the Nation, the passage raised a question of taste, on which Mr. Shaw was willing to meet Mr. Redford's views. "It seems to us," says the Nation, "outspoken, rather than gross"; which is nowadays your true Nonconformist way of putting things, and warrants us, though we have not seen the passage, in assuming that it is, in fact,

"gross" rather than "outspoken." The passage which Mr. Shaw refuses to expunge is said by the Nation to be essential to the heart and meaning of the play. And our contemporary is of opinion that, in asking Mr. Shaw to extirpate it, the Lord Chamberlain's Office has outraged the decencies. Here are the words which have so much to do with the heart and meaning of Mr. Shaw's play:

BLANCO: Take care, Boozey. He hasn't finished with you yet. He always has a trick up His sleeve.

ELDER DANIELS: Oh, is that the way to speak of the Ruler of the Universe—the great and almighty God?

BLANCO: He's a sly one. He's a mean one. He lies low for you. He plays cat and mouse with you. He lets you run loose until you think you're shut of Him; and then when you least expect it, He's got you.

ELDER DANIELS: Speak more respectful, Blanco—more reverent.

BLANCO: Reverent! Who taught you your reverent cant? Not your Bible. It says, "He cometh like a thief in the night"—aye, like a thief—a horse-thief. And it's true. That's how He caught me, and put my neck into the halter. To spite me because I had no use for Him—because I lived my own life in my own way, and would have no truck with His "Don't do this," and "you must do that," and "You'll go to hell if you do the other." I gave Him the go-bye, and did without Him all these years. But He caught me out at last. The laugh is with Him as far as hanging goes.

The beauty and dignity and literary distinction of these words will be obvious to every good Nonconformist. The Nation describes them as an effort on the part of Mr. Shaw "to think in terms of the dramatic," and it goes on to favour us with the following piece of sophistry, which we hope will be properly admired by the Nonconformists and Quakers of that ancient seat of the cocoa industry, York:

Having regard to all that the Censor has done and all that he has left undone, let us also mark his resolve to treat as mere blasphemy on Mr. Shaw's part the artist's endeavour to depict a rough man's first consciousness of a Power that, selecting Blanco as it selected Paul and John Bunyan, threatens to drag him through moral shame and physical death, if needs be, to life, and not to let him go till He has wrought His uttermost purpose on him. Mr. Shaw naturally makes Blanco talk as an American horse-stealer would talk. But how does Job talk of God, or the Psalmist, or the author of the Parables? Nearly every one of Blanco Posnet's railings can be paralleled from Job. Listen to this:

The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure, into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.

He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged.

He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way.

They grope in the dark without light, and He maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.

* * * * *

Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with His net.

He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass, and He hath set darkness in my paths.

He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone: and mine hope hath He removed like a tree.

Is this blasphemy? Is not Mr. Shaw's theme and its expression a reflection of Job's, save that in the one case a bad man speaks, and in the other a good one?

We have always contended that cocoa was a dull and soul-destroying drink; and it appears to us that here we have another pitiable example of the depths which can be plumbed by persons who blunt their faculties with this deadly brew. Mr. Massingham dare not say that the words he quotes from Job are blasphemy, any more than he dare say that the words he quotes from Shaw are not blasphemy. He begs the whole question when he likens Shaw to Job and when he likens Shaw's hero to John Bunyan and Saint Paul. In point of fact, Shaw is no more like Job than he is like

Jupiter, and Shaw's hero is no more like John Bunyan or Saint Paul than he is like Mrs. Pankhurst. To discuss the theological aspect of Job's writings with people who cannot see the difference between "Blanco Posnet" and "Pippa Passes," and who pretend that Mr. Shaw's play is similar in theme to the "Pilgrim's Progress," would be to insult the intelligence of our readers. There are plenty of passages in the New Testament which your atheist can quote with wonderfully specious effect when it suits him. But that a Nonconformist should suggest blasphemy against poor old Job, in order to bolster up the reputation of Shaw as a God-fearing man, would be altogether too ridiculous if it did not happen to be scandalous. We are not concerned with the blasphemies of Job or the sins of King David or the wickedness of John Bunyan or the wickedness of Saint Paul, but with the catch-penny and doubtful devices of George Bernard Shaw. We can quite readily conceive that a man of Posnet's character might speak of the Deity in the terms in which Mr. Shaw makes him speak of the Deity. What is more, we can conceive of such a man speaking of the Deity in even fouler terms. Mr. Shaw has drawn the line somewhere. He knows perfectly well that men of the type of Posnet are capable of using, and do use, epithets before the name of God which are unrepeatable. If Mr. Shaw is the true artist the Nation imagines him to be, and if the heart and meaning of his play are involved in the absolute coarseness of Posnet, why has Mr. Shaw kept the worst from us? He draws the line—and very properly. Unfortunately for him, however, he draws the line a great deal more slackly and loosely than the average decent person, and quite apart from what Job may have said, we are not going to have Blanco Posnets mouthing their coarse and indecent theological views across an English stage. Perhaps Mr. Massingham would like to read the passages which he quotes from "Blanco Posnet" in the next Nonconformist Sunday School. Or, conceivably, Mr. Rowntree might like to rise in meeting and read the same passages to the excellent Quakers of York. Neither Mr. Massingham nor Mr. Rowntree would condescend to any such reading. Why should they, then, complain because Mr. Redford recognises the advisability of preventing some unfortunate actor or other from bawling them to a respectable audience at a theatre? Of course, from the Nonconformist and Quaker point of view, people who go to the theatre are damned to begin with; so that a few words more or less from Mr. Shaw may not appear to be of great consequence. But even people who go to theatres have a right to be protected against unseemliness, and we are heartily glad that Mr. Redford has had the courage to exercise the powers of protection which are in his hands. It is interesting to note that the only other journal which is calling vigorously for Mr. Redford's removal because he has stood up for decency, is the Daily News, which is also a cocoa-fed and cocoa-supported sheet; besides being the chief organ of political Nonconformity and Socialistic Liberalism. There is a great deal of virtue in cocoa.

THE SINS OF THE "SATURDAY"

THERE would appear to be something peculiarly ripe about the State of Denmark. The other week a great poet paid the debt of Nature. Immediately that excellent trade organ, the Athenæum, burst into print with an estimate of the great poet from the exalted and discriminating hand of one of the colleagues of "Captain Coe," of the Star. We reproved our misguided contemporary for this extraordinary lapse, and our words do not appear to have been wasted; for the Athenæum's eulogy of the late George Meredith, who has died since the great poet died, took a fortnight to produce, and is not signed by the colleague of

"Captain Coe." But while Mr. Rendell would appear to have profited by the lesson we offered him, Mr. Hodge, of the Saturday Review, continues his froward career, and has lately served up to his readers an article concerning a recently deceased poet from the pen of the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail. At the time the article in question appeared in the Saturday we commented upon it in suitable terms; and, apparently, with a view of justifying himself, Mr. Hodge has since printed a number of letters which have been addressed to him on the subject by outside persons. In these epistles, one need scarcely say, the article of the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail is described as "admirable," "moving and eloquent," "excellent and moving," "just," "fearless and unexaggerated," and so forth; so that we make no doubt that Mr. Hodge now regards the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail's article with proper pride, and in the rosy light of what Carmelite House would call "a scoop." And what is more, he no doubt imagines that the common persons who had the temerity to confess themselves unimpressed by the brummagem and cheap sentiment of the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail are utterly confounded and confuted by the present pretty show of correspondence. The facts, however, remain where they were; and we regret that we should find ourselves still entirely unable to congratulate the Saturday Review on its manner of dealing with them. It is, perhaps, too innocent in us to expect from a journal of the Saturday's reputation a fine regard for letters and for the integrity of letters. Friendships and the capturing of the ear of the grounding sentimentalist must always weigh with the Saturday when these affairs happen to be balanced against letters. An oily deportment and expressions of choking sympathy are doubtless more necessary to our contemporary than a proper opinion about poetry and the poetical decencies. Your minor poet A. commits himself to unseemly and blasphemous statements and devotes a whole blank verse composition to their development. B. points out that this has been done. A. dies or disappears, and the Saturday Review hires the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail to produce a pathetic article, in which it is explained that A. has been scandalously treated and cruelly neglected, and that the poor man had not sufficient money to entertain his friends to dinner at the Criterion Restaurant. And a fortnight later persons of the name of Wheeler, Legge and Coutts, together with a person who signs himself "A Mourner for the Old Order," are brought on to tell us how grateful they are to the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail for his eloquent and moving article. We should have imagined that the Saturday Review knew better. But with the colleague of "Captain Coe" producing panegyrics on Swinburne for the Athenæum, and the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail whimpering in Mr. Hodge's organ because his friend was short of money, we cannot expect the correspondence in that organ to be over-wise. Leaving out the main question, which we shall not discuss further than to assert flatly that John Davidson received a good deal better treatment both at the hands of criticism and at the hands of the State than his talent warranted, we should like to deal with some of the minor matters raised by the Saturday's correspondence, and in dealing with them we must premise that we do so because they seem to us to be important, and because the editor of the Saturday Review appears to consider them negligible. Correspondent No. 1 is an entertaining being. He says: "As to reviews, is it Utopian to look for a time when the anonymous reviewer will carry as little weight as the anonymous letter-writer?" The Saturday apparently has not the pluck to answer this childish enquiry with an honest "No." The Saturday's reviewing, like the Athenæum's reviewing, and the Outlook's reviewing, and, to drop from the sublime to the pompous, the Spectator's reviewing, is all anonymous. We are not concerned to assert that it is other than honest reviewing. But we do assert that there are grave reasons for supposing that the editors or proprietors of these journals dare not have it signed; for the very simple reason that whatever weight it possesses is due to the old reputations of the journals we have mentioned, and that the people who do the work are persons of little or no importance in the department of letters. When the Athenæum allows an important article to be signed, the signature is a revelation—it is the signature of a colleague of "Captain Coe." When the Saturday Review allows a "scoop" article to be signed it is with the signature of the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail! What skeletons in the way of signatures may mop and mow in the reviewing cupboards of the Spectator and the Outlook Heaven alone knows! In any case, if the names of the actual working reviewers on the literary weeklies were to be divulged, much less printed at the foot of their notices, the polite world would at least be amused. Persons who write and persons who publish will tell you that reviews make no difference; broadly speaking, they tell you the truth; consequently, it is not Utopian "to look for a time when the anonymous reviewer will carry as little weight as the anonymous letter-writer." Mr. Hodge's correspondent goes on to suggest, like the babe that he is, that reviews are anonymous because reviewers are cowards and delight to express their resentment through a mask, which "conceals their identity." Mr. Hodge makes no demur. In point of fact, there is not a reviewer in London who does not pant to sign his remarks, acrimonious or otherwise, as the hart pants after the waterbrooks. But his editor won't let him, which is the fly in his ointment, the bitter in his sweet, the moth in his dinner-jacket and the scrawl in his inner-parts. In an ideal world everybody would sign. In a mundane world nobody signs; but it is not from modesty, and still less from cowardice. We are quite willing to admit that there are reviewers in the world who can be a trifle more malicious because of their anonymity than they would be without it. But, in point of fact, there is scarcely any malice in anybody's reviewing, and the little extra is readily discerned and passes by one more or less as the idle wind. The fault with most reviewing is that it is too tender, too chicken-hearted, and too given over to the proclamation of geese for swans. A very great deal of it, indeed, is written purely with an eye on the publishers, who, taking them in the rough, will inevitably refuse to advertise in journals which do not "work in with them" over reviewing. Of course, the editors of all literary papers are persons of honour in this regard. We shall not deny it, and we shall not assert that they consciously permit the publisher to control their reviewing columns. But it is an absolute certainty that the reviewer who insists upon saying the truth about modern books when he is invited to review them, seldom gets invited. He is voted "too severe" and said to lack the suavitor in modo which the manners of the time demand. However, this is a subject which could be developed at great length, and, fascinating though it be, the Saturday's other correspondents are waiting.

Letter-writer No. 2, a gentleman of the name of Legge, adventures on the following observation:

During the past few weeks the patronising impertinence of successful mediocrity, and the self-satisfied dogmatism of anonymous ignorance towards an unhappy man of genius, have made an appropriate epilogue to the tragedy. . . . Perhaps the contention of these sages is true, that Davidson was a failure. At any rate, his failure was a greater thing than the success of many other men.

Again the editor of the Saturday Review makes no demur, and this time we think quite rightly. If any persons have contended that John Davidson was a failure they have plainly written themselves down for foolish persons. For our part we believe that Davidson expressed every ounce that was in him to express up to the time of his disappearance, and we have yet to learn how a man who could always find a publisher and always find an editor, and who received one hundred and fifty pounds a year from the State could be considered to have failed. There is not a poet in England to-day who, on being informed that Mr. Asquith had been graciously pleased to put him on the Civil List to the tune of a hundred and fifty pounds per annum, would not consider that he had achieved success of the most comfortable kind where poetry is concerned. We can put our hands on at least two better poets than John Davidson to whom a hundred and fifty pounds a year from the State would mean all the difference between contempt and recognition and between poverty and competence. If ever a man had reason to thank his lucky stars, that man was John Davidson. A poet who sets out with a passionate longing for the sales of Miss Marie Corelli must never consider himself a failure if he does not get them. It is no good searching the empty cash-box of Poesy for gold pieces. The Muse is bankrupt and besieged by duns, and it is nobody's fault. Neither does she require us to be sorry for her. Her possessions and the possessions of her proper followers are necessarily and eternally different from the possessions of Mammon. She gives of such gifts as she has to rich men as well as to poor men; and she is not altogether likely to love the poor man who desires to make himself rich or even competent with her assistance. We do not wish to suggest by these words that Davidson was a poet for money's sake, or that he spent his life in a desire to make himself snug. He went wrong in a far more serious article—that is to say, he was infected with too much love of notice. It is now being argued by people of the stamp of the ex-literary editor of the Daily Mail that recognition is as necessary to the poet as breath, and that it is a debt which the public owes to any person who can produce passable verses. We do not agree in the least. Recognition may be presumed to be pleasant and even inspiring, but it is no part of a poet's business to covet it or to allow the desire for it to develop into a passion. He must tear such a desire out of his heart and keep it out at all costs. Recognition has never been, and never can be, an affair for the poet himself. And it is not an affair for his friends, at any rate in their human capacity of friendship. We do not think for a moment that John Davidson's friends ever failed him. We are glad to believe that they loved and admired him and did for him all that it was possible for them to do. Furthermore, we do not believe that he ever had either enemies or detractors; there was no conspiracy to hold him down; there was no conspiracy of silence against him. There was nobody in England who failed to praise him for the good parts of his work. But apparently his position among his fellows did not content him. He could not point to any poet, other than Swinburne, and possibly Meredith, who was, on the whole, receiving a greater share of recognition and emolument than he was himself receiving. We always regarded him as a comfortable, happy, contented man. And, in spite of what he has written, we should doubt very much whether his disappearance had anything to do with either lack of recognition or lack of means. In any case, the public is not to blame, and it is ridiculous of the Saturday Review or any other journal to say otherwise. Cant is of no use to any of us, even if it reaches us by way of the Saturday Review. We should advise our contemporary to be a little more concerned for poetry and a little less inclined to dabble with personal and sentimental affairs. We have not enquired into the treatment meted out to John Davidson's work by the Saturday Review at the time when John Davidson was still amongst us. We should like to wager, however, that it was not treatment which commended itself entirely to Mr. Davidson's friends. On the other hand, if the Saturday Review praised Davidson's poetry in ample and sufficient terms, Davidson must have had the satisfaction of knowing that he had been praised by a journal whose contempt for poetry is notorious; and it seems a little odd that the Saturday should complain. And if the Saturday blamed him, as it may well have done, it is equally odd that it should now put on the aspects of the outraged and the shocked.

THE REVISION OF THE PRAYER BOOK—III.

HAVING reviewed in our former articles certain radical changes which it is proposed to make in the Prayer Book, we shall now notice some further alterations suggested. Two of these are of importance; the rest are for the most part trivial, and very often in the nature of concession to weak-minded faddists. In an open letter to Mr. W. H. Hill, Lord Halifax has pointed out that "The Ornaments Rubric is only too plain. Revision is advocated, not as an escape from ambiguity, but as an escape from its plain obligations." This is only too true; and since the prosecution of a priest for wearing the legal vestments is now felt to be impossible, it is sought to place restriction on the use of vestments by saying that "they shall be recognised as lawful under proper regulations." As might be expected, these "regulations" are not defined, so that provision is thus elaborately made for embittered strife; these blind guides labouring under the fond delusion that they are making a way for peace. At the same time, what is really unlawful is to be made legal, and given the first place—viz., the wearing of "the surplice with stole or scarf and the hood of his degree." Here it may be noted that anything more ludicrous than emphasising an academic hood as an Eucharistic vestment can hardly be imagined, especially when it is remembered of how many divers and wondrous colours and shapes the hoods of many academies are composed.

The last paragraph but one of the present directions concerning the Service of the Church reads thus: "And all Priests and Deacons are to say daily the Morning and Evening Prayer, either privately or openly, not being let by sickness, or some other urgent cause."

It was proposed to substitute "reasonable" for "urgent." The reason for this change was candidly stated in Convocation last month by the Archdeacon of Leicester: "The relief it would afford was," he considered, "even more needed now, when the duties of the Parish Priest were so complicated and exacting." This is truly an amazing method of excuse from primary duty. Mothers' Meetings, Bands of Hope, Finance and Sports Committees, et hoc genus omne are more important for a priest than Bible Reading and Prayer. We should have thought that the dignitaries who inspire rubrical change would have been mindful of the Priests' Ordination vow, "to be diligent in Prayers, and in reading of the Holy Scriptures." Our observation is that the men who are most scrupulous in having daily services are the town clergy, who have the greatest calls on their time; but in any case the reading privately of an office can take only ten to fifteen minutes. (It is satisfactory to record that Convocation rejected the proposed alteration.)

We find ourselves fully in accord with one suggestion: that the Table of Lessons for Sundays, especially the Lessons from the Old Testament, should be revised. A great many chapters now read might be omitted with advantage—merely cruel episodes in the history of a cruel and semi-barbaric people. The Prophecies and the Books of the Apocrypha afford a wealth of choice for spiritual edification.

We cannot but agree with the alteration in the coarse-spoken Exhortation at the beginning of the Marriage Service, with its unseemly reference to the "brute beasts that have no understanding," yet which, poor creatures, only follow the laws of God in propagating their species, and maintaining life in the world.

A speaker at a recent public meeting in London declared that in this Exhortation "the Church of England declares with no uncertain voice that she adheres to the teaching of the Catholic Church and of the Bible that the single life is the higher one, by speaking of those who marry as 'such persons as have not the gift of continency.'"

We should like to know where is this authority of the Church or the Bible for this audacious statement. We are well aware of the personal opinion of St. Paul, given to meet special emergency, as he expressly informs us. Further, is it not manifestly absurd and illogical, first to inform people that "marriage was instituted of God in the time of man's innocence," and almost in the same breath to state that "it was ordained for a remedy against sin"? It would require a casuist indeed to reconcile these contradictory propositions. It is wisely suggested to omit the whole of the second clause in the Exhortation.

A want of liturgical knowledge is shown in a new Table to regulate the Service when two Feasts or Holy Days fall upon the same day. One example will suffice. When the Festival of the Annunciation falls upon a Sunday in Lent, Good Friday or Easter Day, it is simply suggested that the Collect for the Annunciation shall follow the Collect of the day. Nothing is said as to the transference of the Festival to another day, and thus we are left with a sort of nod to a great Festival on a Fast Day like Good Friday, a curious incongruity. In the Holy Communion office the Rubric ordering a sermon to be preached is altered so as to make the sermon optional. This practically upsets the Reformation Settlement, by which the Holy Communion (not Matins) was regarded as the chief service of Sunday, and therefore the only service in which a sermon was ordered, when the largest number of people would naturally be present for worship.

Further, a new Rubric is to be inserted, which is simply a most unwarrantable licence to make the first half of the Communion office an entirely separate service without any Communion. This is an altogether mischievous suggestion, for which there is no precedent in the Catholic Church.

In the Baptismal office the words "in the vulgar tongue" are to be omitted in the exhortation to godparents to teach children the Creed, etc. This is a charming and thoughtful concession to the sensitive. How rude and unkind to tell the moneyed and well-dressed people of Suburbia to teach their children in the "vulgar" tongue! But the revisers are inconsistent. Why do they not suggest another concession? Instead of saying "this child" to ask: "Hath this young gentleman (or lady) been already baptized?"

And certainly the title of another office should be altered to "The Churching of Ladies."

Here we may observe in passing that when the banns of several couples are to be asked at the same time, the Curate is to say, "If any of you know cause . . . why these persons respectively should not be joined together." Seeing that this word is often now used by clergy in publishing banns, and that it is generally heard and understood as "respectably," we should have thought it would be wiser (if not kinder) to leave the Rubric as it is. In the Order for the Burial of the Dead, instead of the direction that the office is not to be used for those who "have laid violent hands upon themselves," the order is "for any that die . . . in the commission of any grievous crime." This suggestion shows an amazing absence of insight and foresight. How are the words "grievous crime" to be defined? And who is to define what is a grievous crime? Here is certainly a road to bitter trouble for relatives and all concerned, resultant from the possible vagaries of parsons possessing more conscience than common-sense, more scruples than common humanity.

In "Another Order for the Burial of the Dead" there occurs a very mild prayer for the departed, so timid that we almost wonder that an additional petition for pardon is not added lest it might have been wrong so to pray.

There has been much talk for years, and academic discussion in Convocation, about enriching our Prayer Book. These nervous, would-be revisers have done nothing of any real value in this direction. But they have suggested dangerous and far-reaching changes, involving questions of doctrine and practice, which would probably lead to deadly strife, if not rupture in the Church. One good work they have accomplished: they have shown what is best avoided, and, chiefly, the risk to the Catholic Faith in any revision at the present time.

PRACTICAL IDEALISM

Idealism as a Practical Creed. By HENRY JONES, LL.D., D.Litt. (Maclehose, Glasgow, 6s. net.)

IF we turn to the severely impartial pages of the dictionary for a definition of "Idealism" (since it is well to be clear as to the meaning of our terms before we discuss their bearing upon life) we find, among other sentences which are hors concours, "tendency towards the highest conceivable perfection, love for or search after the best and highest"; looking farther, we note that an Idealist is "one who holds the doctrine of Idealism; an unpractical person." He is thus labelled somewhat gnatuously, and, considering that the words derive from a Greek root meaning "to see," this seems rather a curt way of dismissing the Idealistic school of philosophy; but we need not feel discouraged. People of kindly heart and fine insight and strong faith like Professor Henry Jones—we would that there were more of them—are not to be lightly brushed aside as "unpractical persons" without a word or two of protest, and in this case Professor Jones has collected these lectures, delivered in defence of his creed, into a book which we should like to place in the hands of every pessimist, provided that he could read plain English and possessed an intellect capable of grasping thoroughly the close reasoning here set forth. It is close reasoning—we must acknowledge that such volumes are not easy to read; the mind must be alert to note and remember each premiss to appreciate satisfactorily the sequent conclusion; but then, books of philosophy are not written for children.

Of necessity, the author does not attempt to draw up any final rules of belief or to confine his "credo" within the rigid barriers of a sentence or two. Philosophy is not a doctrine: it is an attitude of mind—

"the experience of the world becoming reflective, and endeavouring to comprehend itself; hence a final philosophic theory is not to be attained, and a fixed system is not to be sought." For all his pertinent arguments, his thesis has to admit the existence of a "great Perhaps," in the nature of things human; for not until we perceive a century or an era from an enlightened perspective can we fit together the links in its various conceptions of the universe, as expressed in the works of its mighty men of valour—poets, prophets, philosophers. "No thinker is great," remarks the author, "and no man is potent in action, save by virtue of the might of his times; as no word has meaning, and no musical note or architectural curve has beauty, except in its place":

Great men appear in great ages, and they are creatures of what they create. They come in "the fulness of time," their messengers sent before their face, into a world which is waiting for them. They are the consequences of vast upheavals, products of the world's stress and strain, pushed upwards from beneath by the pressure of mute social forces which have been long mustering. For this reason great men come, not singly as a rule, but in groups, like highest peaks in a mountainous region. The greatest of them does not stand alone, nor does he rise abruptly from the level plain. His base is on the tableland of some vast public emotion, and around him are companions less in magnitude only than himself.

Beginning with a remarkably good series of three essays on "Freedom," Professor Jones proceeds, as many others have done before him, to examine the position of Wordsworth and Browning in relation to the problems of modern belief, and his analysis, though naturally not exhaustive, is cogent and provocative of thought. "Wordsworth must still be regarded as a deliberate idealist and a very great one," he says. The contrast drawn between the two poets is clear and intimate:

When a poet is at his best there is a certain inevitableness in his work. He is driven by his moods as by a strong tempest. He is not always the master of his own conceptions. He says things greater than he knows; and often enough it is only the slowly maturing experience of later times which can bring out and make good his meaning. . . . No two great poets differ more from one another than do Wordsworth and Browning; yet their mission and their testimony were the same. They triumphed by virtue of the same convictions. Browning's expression of the unity of man and Nature in God was not so inevitable as Wordsworth's. It was more articulate and defined and punctuated; but it was less like the circumambient atmosphere, or the open eye of universal day. The unity of man and Nature for Wordsworth was temperamental, and it expressed itself in moods that were common to both; in the same gladness, love and peace; the notion of the Spirit within them was tranquil, like the deep breathing of a strong man asleep. But Browning's intuition of their unity was acquired. We feel that he had sat at the feet of modern science, even though he transfigured its lessons. We hear from him of the unity of the structures of visible things. He brooks no break in the ascent from lowest being to man's endowment; but he delights to mark its stages.

To return for a while to the essays on "Freedom," where the logical element appears at its best, Professor Jones points out how really complicated is this apparently simple conception, as are those of the psychologist's outfit, Mind and Reason and Will. "This simplicity is all false appearance. These ideas are simple only in the sense in which the seed of a plant is simple: its complexities are hidden, and its powers are asleep; it requires the whole scheme of Nature, earth and sea and sky and the revolving seasons, all in one conspiracy, to bring them forth." Through the early stages of civilisation, from that of the Greeks upwards, the rise of freedom—actual bodily liberty, at first—is traced; and the unanswerable question as to man's freewill takes its place in the discussion. "To do such things justice we require both

'Yes' and 'No.' It is true, in a sense, that the child is the man; but it is also true that he is not the man, and that his sole business, his life through, is to become the man." Human reason, of course, forms the fascinating subject of many pages, and it is curious to note here, as an aside, that precisely as in fiction we cannot do without Mr. Henry James, so in the domain of philosophy essayists depend for some of their points upon his brother of Harvard; in no less than four recently published treatises he is quoted and valued.

The art of ratiocination is dear to the young philosopher: "he is like the puppy-dog—he must tear things to pieces while he is teething"; and with this Platonic metaphor the author alludes to those men who appear at certain periods, "on the way to wisdom and not yet arrived." They bring trouble in their train; they have a good conceit of themselves, and would set the cosmos dancing to their own tune. "They will adopt no belief except that which approves itself to them as true; they will obey no law which they do not think just; they will lend themselves to no purpose which they do not themselves approve; and they have no misgivings, for the world has shrunk into the measure of their thoughts, and they know not that their minds circle within a larger system." Continuing, we have the description of the tardy progress of these ideas of freedom in thought. "There are no leaps in morals and politics, any more than in mathematics. It is as vain to try to superimpose an enlightened social polity on a savage people as to expect a beginner in mathematics to solve problems in the differential calculus. . . . If you cannot prove the truth of the things of the spirit to the natural man, no more can you prove or disprove a complex physical truth to an uneducated mind. A little child can make nothing of an advanced mathematical formula." And finally the logical results of the partial state of freedom to which our present condition of civilised life has attained are exemplified and discussed.

Throughout the book, however, the thing that strikes us as especially admirable and courageous is the author's insistence on an apparent paradox—the practicability of the visionary's outlook on the universe; and as this is precisely what he set out to prove, his matter and method must, from our point of view, be pronounced an unqualified success. "Man is never at his best," he remarks, "except when he is in touch with ultimate issues," and for the attainment of those ultimate issues the mind of the dreamer is a necessary equipment. "I do not wish you," he remarks, "to conclude that the poetic version of the world is the true version. But, on the other hand, I should like to warn you against what we know is the greater danger—namely, the assumption that the only version which can be true is the prose version." Again, addressing his students at Sydney University, he says:

Your city sparkles like a gem under your clear skies—with all its defects, a fair thing in the midst of loveliness. May I ask without presumption whether at times you pause, so that its beauty may pass into the soul and saturate it with joy? I do not judge you, for I do not know. But one thing I do know—that no man and no nation was ever truly great which did not commune with the quiet of the world—sometimes by means of reflective contemplation, as in the East; sometimes by means of Art, as in Greece and Mediæval Italy; more frequently by means of religion. Israel's greatest statesman was called forth from the land of Midian, where he tended sheep.

It was ever so: the man who gets the most out of life is he who cultivates the receptive attitude of mind, whose strength comes through quietness; which is by no means to predicate him as an idler or a non-combatant, be it clearly understood. "The structure of things is spiritual," and the office of Morality, Philosophy, Art and Religion is to reveal.

They elicit the music that is already there, like the wind amongst the pines. Morality does not make a man his brother's keeper: it reveals the brotherhood which had been ignored. Philosophy does not devise. It discovers. The presupposition which underlies all its efforts is that the truth is there, if it could only get at it, embedded in the very nature of things. Art is not artifice. It holds the mirror up to Nature, and the beauty of Nature passes into its face. Religion does not invent its God, it finds Him: and, at its best, it finds Him everywhere.

This seems to us excellently expressed, and worthy of all praise. Indeed, half the value of this volume lies in the trains of thought suggested by many well-considered sentences, perceptions which lead on almost involuntarily to personal investigation—a good test of the worth of a writer's matter. The objections of rationalism the author treats with respect, realising that all of them cannot be adequately met; but he need hardly have gone to such lengths to prove his own case. Rationalism and Idealism will never be reconciled. How can they be? They are on either side of a double-tinted wall, arguing as to its colour, and we will go farther, and say that the analogy holds good in that to some degree they are both right. The practical man must have a creed, though it be a poor thing; but the idealist aims higher, and is better off in the end. For one of his fundamental decisions is a threefold cord—that good will prevail, that "God's in His heaven," and that "all's right with the world," as far as men will allow it to be so; believing such a serene creed, he may well strive to assist the general welfare by bringing it down a little from the realm of dreams to the level of earth. And if only all idealists could accomplish this as successfully as the author of the book before us, the world might become a sweeter place to live in.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Netta. By FRED M. WHITE. (Ward, Lock and Co., 6s.)

"SUDDENLY Lady Langworthy grew silent and almost rigid, and Netta felt, rather than saw, Gordon Falmer approaching. As she looked up she seemed to see two lightning sparks flash from his eyes." Aha! We know him—the villain, of course. But, no; it cannot be, for he "dies with awful celerity" on page 39. Perhaps this is he: "A man sat writing, a neat-looking man. . . . His hair was red, his eyes met nothing squarely, they were grey and shifty and cunning, with queer lights in them at certain times." Those queer lights are suspicious. Stay—we must not do him an injustice, for villain No. 1 comes to life again on page 92. Aha! We scent hidden documents and secret societies and all sorts of creepy things, and our perspicacity is proved correct, for "papers" have to be found in order to clear somebody's character, and Netta is the girl to find them; she rises to her feet on page 52, her eyes flashing and her breast heaving—"But it shall be done," she says between her teeth. "It shall. For your sake, my darling, I would do more terrible things than that. I will not leave this house till I know whether those papers are here or not." Brave creature! A pair of dice is the "sign" of the secret society, and a wonderful fluid which has the power of suspending animation explains the peculiar behaviour of villain No. 1. Within about thirty pages "that which before had been a motor-car was a mass of crumpled metal"—struck by lightning; the red-haired gentleman is blinded by the same flash; Netta plays a melody on her violin which makes Falmer (a) start; (b) his face go white; (c) his muscles stand out in knots; and (d) beads glisten on his forehead. To recapitulate all the extraordinary things that happen in this extraordinary novel would—dare we say it?—weary our readers. We shall merely observe that Mr. White's fertility is amazing, and that his plot will prove very exciting to those who can read such a book as a means of pleasure. Unfortunately, we have to read it.

Leaves of the Lower Branch; the Attorney in Life and Letters. By E. B. V. CHRISTIAN. (Smith, Elder and Co.)

THE attorney, until about fifty years ago, seems to have been a very unfortunate person. He was the man to be abused by litigants when things went wrong; he was villified in literature, and accounted of small repute in society, so that the craft of the law as far as he was concerned suffered from much ill-considered wit and unmannerly oburgation. "What doctors were to Molière, what mothers-in-law are to the singers of the music-hall, that practitioners of the law are to the world at large," says the author on his first page; and his task has been in an exhaustive manner to trace these "leaves of the lower branch" (though not necessarily "shady" branch) through their vicissitudes in fact and fiction, so that the reader may learn a little more about the poor, maligned lawyer and his fate. Very interestingly it is done. He begins with a learned inquiry as to the plausibility of the immortal breach-of-promise case "Bardell v. Pickwick," and asserts, to the complete astonishment of the uninitiated, that those two smug and specious worthies, Messrs. Dobson and Fogg, have been dreadfully misunderstood—that, in fact, they were in the right after all, and were scrupulously honest and hard-working men of law! He substantiates this defence by legal demonstration, so we naturally dare not cavil very extensively with his verdict, but it is so great a reversal of the opinions to which from our youth up we had adhered that the shock almost takes away our breath. Proceeding through "The Attorney in the Poets," in which chapter Theobald, the hero of Pope's Dunciad, assumes the position of honour in more senses than one, since he appears to have been very hardly treated by the indefatigable manufacturer of couplets, Mr. Christian deals with "The Novels of the Law," "Bleak House," of course, is the most famous of these; Samuel Warren's "Ten Thousand a Year" and Anthony Trollope's "Orley Farm" come next, while there are various other novels not unknown to fame which make a strong point of legal affairs.

After discussing many aspects of the attorney, we come to "The Attorney as Man of Letters," and, as may be imagined, this section takes up a larger number of pages. The list of lawyers, if we include those who subsequently abandoned the law for other professions, and still made a name in literature, would fill a column, and we must refer our readers to the book itself if they desire more detail. The pages that describe the life of Horace Smith are extremely interesting; in fact, the whole volume is entertaining and well worth reading, if only for the sake of its information on the careers of famous men. If there are mistakes, we have found no glaring ones, and we can be sure that the task of compiling such a tome was no light one.

Mrs. Gramercy-Park. By A. R. GORING-THOMAS. (John Lane, 6s.)

THE American lady who is the heroine of this exhilarating novel differs from a good many American ladies (of fiction, of course), and we had almost added from most heroines, in that it is impossible to be bored by her company. She is slangy, impetuous, ambitious, extravagant, but she is always delightful. She simply coruscates. Before we quote two or three of her pungent comments on England and the English people we must explain that she has, in her own expressive phrase, "money to burn," and that she comes over here with a meek little lady companion, determined to enter society and to spy out the land. In fact, "the Atlantic had been crossed for the specific purpose of watching the English Aristocrat get very drunk, cheat at cards and talk in epigrams."

She wanted to see him behave as he is generally depicted as behaving in the social and dramatic literature of the United States. Mrs. Gramercy-Park wanted to hear him say "By Jove," and "bally," and to see him wallow in a wild and wicked luxury. She was prepared, if the luxury included a good time for herself and the epigrams were not too humourlessly English, to marry a specimen aristocrat.

Her first experience with a family at Streatham, which she fondly hoped would afford a glimpse into the gilded halls of wicked baronets and wily dukes, is a pathetic failure; she merely meets the usual "arty" cranks who affect a mild bohemianism, are strenuously witty, and cultivate "spooks." By judicious manoeuvring, however, she does become a guest at various lofty places, and her desperate attempts to fathom the English mind, and, afterwards, to bind herself to a gentleman by proposing to him in a most barefaced manner, form an amusing medley—sometimes a trifle too much on the absurd side, we must admit. Mrs. Gramercy-Park herself, and her remarks in her letters to a friend, are irresistible. "I just feel about English jokes," she writes, "as most people would feel about walking barefooted in a dark room where some carpet-nails were lying around point upwards." She likes the hotel servants so much that she tips them every time she sees them, "to make sure that they shall go on doing it." The other characters are good; Mr. Harden, who expostulates with a friend to the effect that "if you marry a fool you're miserable, and if you marry a clever woman you don't know where you are," is one of the best. "Livin' with a clever woman," he says, "is like livin' with a mustard plaster. It's so damned irritating." And we must not omit Mousie Turton, Mrs. Gramercy-Park's companion, who outstrips her patron by having the sheer luck to nurse a little boy through a fever and marry his father, who shortly after becomes a duke. The way the acquaintance of these two, which began on board ship, is extended we must not expatiate upon; it is ingenious and not improbable; but its dénouement drives poor Mrs. Gramercy-Park raving with jealousy, and we leave her vowing that she "has not begun yet," that she will "buy a duke or a Serene Highness" and "make things hum in this old town." For which we do not part with her on the best of terms. Still, as one of her suspicious intimates remarks: "What's the use of disliking a person who has seventy thousand a year?" Her lively personality carries the book through without one dull page.

The Wooden Horse. By HUGH WALPOLE. (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.)

It is not often, among the general run of novels, that the setting of the story matters a great deal; too frequently the scenery is a mere necessity—things evidently must happen somewhere; but into this remarkably fine book the author has managed to weave the very spirit of the west country until the craving to see the "Delectable Duchy" once more, and to hear the cadence of Cornish voices, is almost overwhelming—at any rate, it is so to one who has already seen and heard these things and come under their magic spell. We feel sure no casual choice determined the stage for Mr. Walpole's characters; he knows the haunting charm, the in-dwelling mystery of western moors and seas; he has heard the speech of its little bays of silver-sand, its tiny fairy harbours, and his success is complete.

The hero of the events which take place in these enchanting surroundings, Harry Trojan, has returned to the town of "Pendragon" after an absence of eighteen years, to find his ancient and historic home the centre of a little cult of language æstheticism, in the toils of which his son Robin has been caught, and the theme of the book is the struggle of this strong, hearty man for recognition among his own people. Very finely is the situation portrayed. He has looked forward for months to the first stroll with Robin: Robin has some books to see for a friend. He opens the windows to let in the glorious sea-sounds and the salt wind; his sister shivers and closes them. Things have altered since he went to New Zealand all those years ago; the town has changed; people look down on him superciliously from intellectual heights, and the son whose love and comradeship he had longed for so keenly has been learning "to adjust ties correctly and to choose waistcoat-buttons." Only the dear land is the same, but he hears with dismay that the fishing hamlet of "The Cove" is doomed to become fashionable.

As he passed down the crooked, uneven stone steps that led to the Cove he felt indignant, almost unhappy. It was as if a friend had been insulted in his presence and he had been unable to defend him. They said that the Cove must go, must make way for modern jerry-built lodging-houses, in order that middle-class families from London and Manchester might be sufficiently accommodated. The Cove had meant a great deal to him when a boy—mystery, romance, pirates and smugglers, strange Cornish legends of saints and sinners, knights and men-at-arms. The little inn, "The Bended Thumb," with its irregular, red-brick floor and its smoke-stained oaken rafters, had been the theatre of many a stirring drama—now it was to be pulled down, and there would be electric trams. It was a wonderfully beautiful morning, and the little twisting street of the Cove seemed to dance with its white shining cobbles in the light of the sun. It was as mysterious as ever, but colours lingered in every corner. Purple mists seemed to hang about the dark alleys and twisting ways; golden shafts of light flashed through the open cottage doorways into rooms where motes of dust danced, like sprites, in the sun; smoke rose in little wreaths of pearl-grey blue into the cloudless sky; there was perfect stillness in the air, and from an overflowing pail that stood outside "The Bended Thumb" the clear drip, drip of the water could be heard falling slowly into the white cobbles, and close at hand was the gentle lap of the sea, as it ran up the little shingly beach and then dragged slowly back again with a soft, reluctant hiss.

It was the Cove in its gentlest mood. No one was about; the women were preparing the dinner and the men were away at work. No strange faces peered from inhospitable doorways; there was nothing to-day that could give the stranger a sense of outlawry, of almost savage avoidance of ordinary customs and manners. Harry's heart beat wildly as he walked down the street; there was no change here, it was as he had left it. He was at home here as he could never be in that new, strident Pendragon with its utter disregard of tradition and beauty.

The reader will see at once that the place is inseparable from the story, and Harry is a pathetic figure, moving about listlessly, seeking friends, and for a long time finding none.

Robin gets entangled with a girl, and when he is disillusioned she refuses to give up his compromising letters; it is left for his father to gain them at last by his sincerity and charm where the arts of the other members of the household had failed; this pitiful period through which, as through a purifying fire, the miserable boy passes is recounted with most convincing reality. Then, to the consternation of the others, Harry falls in love with Mary Bethel, the daughter of a couple who have settled near. The progress of this late love of his is told very beautifully and tenderly;

we could not wish a single passage altered or a word varied. The return of Robin to a sane, healthy outlook on life concludes the theme. Our thanks are due to the author for a book which we hope will give many of our readers as much unadulterated pleasure as it has given us. We hope, also, that Mr. Walpole will write again about the county he loves so well, for we shall look forward to his next book with exceptional interest.

WAVES

THROUGH the window-panes of the Fir-Cone Inn, across the garden, with its stiff fence of hollyhock, lies the sea; wave upon wave, gemmed with sunshine, uncoiling below upon the beach, or breaking in showers over an old wizard-shaped rock that sailors call "The Spirit of Solitude." Impassive, exiled from the clover-scented cliffs, it gives emphasis to the moving waters about it. Seaweeds cling around its musselled sides, iris-coloured and coral-pink; and once, long ago, so they say, Merlin, the Enchanter, touched "The Spirit of Solitude" with his wand, and ever since it has been under the dominion of the Moon. Why Merlin severed the rock from the land no one knows. Some think that down, deep down, lies buried the Enchanter's secret mysteries. And there is always a strange glamour just there about the sea. Beyond the old-fashioned garden of the Fir-Cone Inn, with its pinks from India and its white and black columbines, the waves break and the sea-gulls pass like pearls against the blue. An amusing contrast to a seventeenth-century seascape, one thinks, with each wave an ingenious curl! Less restrained this glittering mass of water, alluring and sequined as an actress's robe.

There is a delightful seascape in the Brussels Musée which hovers perversely in the mind: A Court seascape, with jade-green waves and ivory foam, curled and correct as a Louis XVI. perruque. Issuing from the shadow of a Greek temple, a lady, with no more serious luggage than a fan, a bouquet of flowers and a little black page, is seen to descend a flight of marble stairs and place, with studied grace, a satin slipper on the side of a barque that seems only made to capsize. Far away, beyond the drooping drapery of her sails, two small clouds, in close conspiracy, thread their way. It seems certain that before this reckless lady has been many hours at sea there will be a storm. One wonders what her destiny can be, whither she is bound, and vaguely—what she will do when she gets there. Will the fan, the flowers and the little black page, the only luxuries that seem left to her, fall victims to the curved treachery of the waves? Impossible to say.

Less artificial, and also less speculative, are the more modern seascapes of Anton Mauve, or of Marais. Take the Mauves and the Marais from the Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam, and compare them mentally with the "Spirit of Solitude"; Mauve, with his predilection for white twilights falling in loneliness over windy sand-dunes, where moor-fowl call in infinite sadness above the tufted grass, whose sole note of colour may lie in the blue smock of some peasant, solitary against the cold colouring of the sea; or Marais, scientific Marais, who knows every caprice of the waves, and sees them with the unemotional eyes of a doctor. Could either render on canvas the elusive fantasy of Merlin's Rock, catch the changing greens, the hurrying violets as they swell and fall, suggest the mystic sheen, the glamour of the Enchanter?

"Merlin! Merlin!" the seagulls scream, and in the garden the flame-red poppies sway, and the gold-tinted leaves of a magnolia blossom unfold wider in the strength of the sun.

Near by, in the village of Seven Stones, a clock strikes noon, twelve mellow notes, like the petals falling from a rose. A siesta? But it would be disgraceful. "If it were only Italy," you sigh. Rimini! to be at Rimini! little sun-baked town. Still, Merlin never had a rock at Rimini! And to return to the invisible flock of sheep, who in all the world could capture "The Spirit of Solitude" if Mauve could not, and Marais could not? . . .

Through the windows of the Fir-Cone Inn (it is not impossible to think and observe the world's happenings at the same time) one can see Pomona, bare-footed Pomona, gathering strawberries for lunch. There is nothing quite so blue in all the sea, or in all the sky, as that print frock of hers, you reflect; and then suddenly comes the flash, the inspiration.

But, of course, how absurd! Nobody could paint "The Spirit of Solitude"; it required music—music alone could describe it; music only could create the atmosphere, conjure up from the depths the forgotten secrets of Merlin, the Enchanter.

"Claud Debussy! Claud Debussy!" scream the seagulls, with the accent on the wrong syllable.

"But, silly birds, why not have said so at the beginning?"

Down on the beach the waves are breaking slowly in showers over an old wizard-shaped rock that sailors call "The Spirit of Solitude," and in the garden Pomona has seated herself on an empty bee-hive in the shadow of a cherry-tree, and is eating all the strawberries herself. A. F.

ADVENTURE

It is a large thing to write of Adventure. So much glamour and romance, such blare of trumpets summoning to arms, such drums throbbing and calling to great deeds are in the wind that a man's heart must quiver to be up and away upon the road to fortune, leading the regiment of his ambitions and in front the standard of chivalry. For I have no patience with those who cry that Adventure is dead and lies among the limbo of forgotten years. The trumpets, perhaps, are somewhat rusty and the drums are not so insistent in their call, but the regiment of ambition is ever upon the march and the standards honourably stained with the red tokens of war are yet to the front.

But it is not of these adventures that I wish to write now. "The most beautiful adventures are not those we go to seek," said Stevenson (he who was so perfect a knight), and if this is true how pitiful a thing it is to think how many men there are who go forth to find adventure, court danger and even make love to Death, whom they boast with a fine bravery of words they like to encounter; how few there are content to stay at home allowing Life to take them by the hand and lead them up the hill to their journey's end, leaving it for the little gods to place in their path these beautiful adventures. It is of this latter, The Gentle Adventure, I write. Of the former, The Joyful Adventure, you may read in Sir Thomas Malory's great book and many others.

But not to all who are content to wait does the Gentle Adventure come: many may go down to the grave and never have looked upon her face, and it is a sad thought to think that when the end is reached they must look back a little wistfully upon the years and acknowledge themselves to have been unworthy: for Adventure is seldom mistaken in the choice of her ministers. But for those who meet her Life will not have been spent in vain. I remember as a small boy being taken to see an old man whose end was not far; for many years he had faithfully done his country's work and was hailed as good friend by men and women of great name. I was ever full of curiosity about old men, how they had gone through the entrancing years of life, what honourable scars they had to show of past conflicts, and with my head full of high deeds and gentle knights I asked him if any great adventure had come to him. And he told me that once unexpected, un hoped for, Adventure had swung from the realms of romance and laid wait for him as he journeyed; he told me of the beauty and the joy of it, of the uplifting of his heart in brave songs of gladness, and of his sorrow when it was finished. "But," he said, and I can still see him in his chair, his grey locks sweeping over his ears and his eyes very tender, "you will learn one day, boy, that a broken heart is not bread nor sorrow the means of life: the memory of pleasant days will outlive and conquer the sadness of their ending." I did not understand then, of course, but I learned the story, the adventure of which he had spoken in later years. A tragedy of no great novelty: the passionate love of a man of great intellect and a poet for a woman who proved unfaithful. But the memory of pleasant days outlived the sadness of their ending: a fitting epitaph for so beautiful a life.

But there are men whose souls are blind; when the Gentle Adventure comes to them upon wide wings they do not see; sightless they are born and sightless they stumble on, because there is no doctor who can heal the blindness of the soul; it is their misfortune, though not their fault, and the majority of those who are blind do not even know of their blindness: it is the more pitiful since often these men's hearts are good and true and they have great affection; but of passion they do not know.

About these beautiful adventures there is not much to write: they are a man's own concern; quietly he will meet them and in the playing of them take his part; intoxicated with their mystery he will not talk, for the more we keep strange happenings to ourselves the more strange and delightful they will appear; and when the play is played and the curtain rung down the chief actor does not speak much upon the part he played. If he played his best he will not care whether the audience was meagre and the critics hostile or the audience large and the critics laudatory, if he made money or if he lost it; it is enough that he played his best and was pleased to play it. And the memory of the part becomes the more precious if he played to please another: some good comrade who could understand, some friend whose tongue was glad to cry "Well done," or, most beautiful, some woman to whom he had given his heart, at whose disposal he had placed his life. Not in vain will he have lived.

"To die would be an awfully big adventure," cried Peter Pan the valiant; and Death is, indeed, a great adventure that must come to all, worthy or unworthy. With stiff limbs and hair grey with the toil of years, with eyes tender because we have learnt the secret of things hidden from youth and to know is to pardon, great of soul we prepare for the last riding out. We take little with us: the record of a life which was well or ill spent; the memory of happy hours or sorrowful; the hope that is born in us and held by many creeds and men that life upon this earth is not all nor in vain, the hope in the immortality of the soul. There are many ways of Death and many opinions as to the best way: for me, that of the man of whom I wrote earlier. One evening in August, when the years were heavy upon his heart, he turned to his dearest comrade: "I am tired," he said simply. He went and lay down in his bedroom, and the members of that simple household gathered round: his friend, his sister and the few servants who loved him because of his ever-ready courtesy to those below him. Kindly and as though he were going but a short journey he bade each farewell. His sister he kissed and said: "You will not mourn," and she answered "No." She, too, understood. There remained but the friend: for a moment they held hands: "Good-bye, old friend," said the man; "I will wait for you upon the other side." He paused and showed the one touch of sentiment: "Do not be long," he whispered, his old voice slightly broken. Soon he turned his face to the wall, and, with courageous heart and high hope, entered upon the long quest. It is the men who do great deeds quietly that keep the beacon of chivalry alight before us.

Though I set out to write of the Gentle Adventure only, there is one side of the other, the Joyful, of which I wish to speak; a side little noticed in the books upon the subject. He who goes into the world as Knight of the Round Table can have no friendship—that rare gift which is as the sweetness of a spring shower upon the grass or as the dew upon the flowers. Many acquaintances he may have, but no friends. For the soul of the Joyful Adventurer is ever equipped with winged feet: from one place to another he goes, nor has time for the quieter realities of life. The cry of the South is in his heart and in gallant ships he sails to the far countries of music and song. Over many lands and waters he travels to drink the bubbling wine of Youth and dance in the revel of the roses. Southward with the swallows his desire leads him, and eastward to hail the sun at the gates of dawn. To feast his eyes upon the treasure of fabled realms; to feed upon the flower of sleep; to taste the spices of the Orient.

But though he travel across the world and follow the winds that blow, he will surely return with longing in his heart to the land of his birth; he will return to seek that for which his soul cries—he knows not what: the cry that sooner or later comes to all wanderers, bringing them back to the land where they lived as boys. But upon the wind-swept quay there will be none to welcome, no smile will lighten the lips of waiting friends. The cry of the South is lonely, and lonely must be the man who answers. He who would up and follow the Piper of Hamelin must become as a little child and take no thought for the delights of later years. Life, gay, irresponsible, heedless of mortal man, holds out her hands; and we have but the two to choose from; in our destiny none can interfere. We are the "masters of our fate," and with us lies the choice.

THE COUNTRY LIFE

WE walked up from the station; the house-agent had said two miles and a bit to the village, and it hardly seemed the good three it was, and the dust was not as the dust of London which we had shaken from our feet. When it rained a little we sheltered under an oak in a cornfield. The hamlet—which "nestled in the heart of rural England," just as the agent had said—was a mere streak of flower-trimmed cottages, and the few slow-going folk we passed wore the fixed unseeing expression of country people, so unlike the alert glance of your Londoner; little flowers grew on the very thresholds. This puzzled me at the time; afterwards I learnt that these front doors were rarely opened, and that the cottage life ebbed and flowed through hidden doors at the back. It all helped out the peaceful impression. A couple of school-children did bob-curtseys as we passed.

Well, we came. We saw the house that day and were conquered, and for long that first impression of welcoming, kindly peace persisted. It is tangled up with the scent of sweet-briar and "old man's beard," and the milk and eggs of our first tea. We wanted it early, and square, that first tea, but had to wait till the cows were milked. Ah! that was something like being in the country. I had forgotten how new milk looked till the hind brought it in from the byre, all foamy and warm.

So long as we only had a surface knowledge of the village and our own ideas of the inhabitants our illusions flourished.

There was old Hobden the Hedger, for instance, his very self, you would say; and the lady of the nearest flower-wreathed cottage was Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch. She passed every morning on her way to the shop, in a velvet mantle, always cheery and odd. Peter said she had a look of the late Dan Leno, but Mrs. Wiggs had it on the whole.

Early in our career the Vicar called. He had been vicar a-many years, so must have known his flock, and I can only wonder now at his forbearance when I (still under the spell) held forth about the unspoiled charm of place and people. It did strike me that his acquiescence was more polite than hearty. Anyway, he used the word "ensorious" in that connection and may have intended a warning. However, for quite a long time that surface knowledge was all we had. But there is an insidious quality about rural tongues which cannot be withstood; by degrees our first fair impressions were effaced, and we learnt at last what the kindly Vicar tried to teach the day he came.

"Ensourious"—and I had put the word aside almost indignantly! Now I know that as a description of his flock it was profoundly understated. Behind those muslin curtains, across those flower-locked porches, from old Hobden the Hedger to the bobbing school-children—over all was the same trail. Call it village gossip, or call it evil speaking, lying and slandering—it's one and the same thing; and for that the village lives. Yonder lad, with a knot of flowers in his cap, who calls the cattle home with a stout stick, stops for a word with the old hedger, while the cattle drink at the wayside pond. It is a pretty picture, just completed by the human interest—let us say the deep human interest. In all likelihood the simple pair are discussing the latest stranger within their gates, and speculating on his sources of income. They are seriously annoyed because the "Nuss" spends so much on white gowns, considering her wages, and they have the gravest doubts of the respectability, or solvency, of "Him." The bluff farmer and his boys have decided, in the pauses of their harvest homing, that it's not for nothing that artist-chap has taken the old Orchard cottage. "Painting scenery" they hold to be the merest blind at all events.

A group of labourers, in stiff Sunday garments, streeled past our gate. They are intimately dissecting life up at the Chapel Farm. Now the Chapel Farm had been interwoven with our early romance about the hamlet. A nice, fat churchwarden, Mr. Penney, had come down on our first Sunday in his shirt-sleeves to enquire if he should "Keep the pew for us," as it was Harvest Thanksgiving. It seemed so friendly, just what you would expect to happen. These honest villagers were now employing their Sabbath leisure in the old, but ever fresh speculation whether Penney's wife had really died of drink, or whether she had been driven to suicide by Penney's evil behaviour. On the whole, they favour the latter surmise. As they approach us they drop Penney's wife, and, turning a bovine gaze on Peter and his bulbs, mutter (audibly outraged) something about "gardening on Sunday!"

It's a dear house—ideal, you'd say. The black ceiling beams are so low that Peter has acquired a chronic stoop. We dine by the light of wax candles, a ring of them in an old iron chandelier, which hangs over the oak table. There are but eleven upstairs, and one of my windows commands a distant prospect of the pigfold. Outside it is half-timbered and draped with a gorgeous wistaria, forbye roses, ivy, and clematis on the porch. The privet-hedge between lawn and garden is clipped into a formal pattern. And I wonder, when all this becomes a memory and I am looking backwards, I do wonder what I shall think of it. You never can coerce these records, they are all on the knees of the gods.

But I hope, I trust, that as the realities recede, the first blessed impression will return, clear and true again. Vague prospects scented with sweet-briar in the early mornings after rain, cowslips at hot noon. Spacious forgotten green lanes shut in by towering, blossoming hedges, where weasels stroll across your path, and garden flowers grow wild and ungathered. The still meadows where mushrooms are found at dusk, with the mist rising. Where the loneliness of crowds is clean forgotten, and Nature lets you come very near.

Something, at least, of all this I hope will come back in time.

I hope that the villagers who break off their scandalous chronicle to scowl at our Sunday gardening will drop out of the picture, and that the women in motor caps and aprons at their bitter gossip over hidden back doors will seem merely an impertinent interruption.

POOR BURRAGE

THE Hippopotamus, a review of literature, science, art, politics, society and the drama, is, as everyone knows, one of the leading literary weeklies. Its original promoters decided on its rather eccentric title, with a symbolism now outmoded. The Hippopotamus was to be impregnable to outside contributors, and the editor was always invisible. The vile and secret arts of réclame and puffery were to find no place in its immaculate pages. One afternoon some time ago a number of gentlemen, more or less responsible for the production of the Hippopotamus, among whom was the editor, were seated round the fire in the smoking-room of a certain club. For the last hour they had been discussing with some warmth the merits of signed and unsigned articles and the reviewing of books. A tall, good-looking man, who pretended to be unpopular, was advocating the anonymous. "There is something so cowardly about a signed article," he was saying. "It is nearly as bad as insulting a man in public, when there is no redress except to call for the police. And that is ridiculous. If I am slated by an anonymous writer it is always in my power to pay no attention, whereas if the slate is signed I am obliged to take notice of some kind. I must either deny the statements, often at a great sacrifice of truth, or if I assault the writer there is always the risk of his being physically stronger than I am. No; anonymous attack is the only weapon for gentlemen."

"To leave for a moment the subject of anonymity," said an eminent novelist, "I think the great curse of all criticism is that of slating any book at all. Think of the unfortunate lady novelist or the young man first entering the paths of literature, and the great pain it causes them. You should encourage them and not damp their enthusiasm."

"My dear fellow," said South, "I encourage no one, and writers should never have any feelings at all. They can't have any, or they would not bore the public by writing."

The discussion was getting heated when the editor, Rivers, interfered.

"My dear South," he began, addressing the first speaker, "your eloquent advocacy of the anonymous reminds me of a curious incident that occurred many years ago when I was assistant editor of the Hippo- potamus. The facts were never known to the public, and my old chief, Curtis, met with much misplaced abuse in consequence. There were reasons for which he could never break silence, but it happened so long ago that I cannot be betraying any confidence. All of you have heard and some of you have seen Quentin Burrage, whose articles practically made the Hippopotamus what it now is. His opinion on all subjects was looked forward to by the public each week. Young poetasters would tremble when their time should come to be pulverised by the scathing epigrams which fell from his anonymous pen. Essayists, novelists, statesmen were pale for weeks until a review appeared that would make or mar their fame. In the various literary coteries of London no one knew that Quentin Burrage was the thumper who thrilled, irritated or amused them. With the exception of myself and Curtis, no one knew exactly how much he wrote, though he was, of course, recognised as an occasional contributor. The secret was well kept. He was practically critical censor of London for fifteen years. A whole school of novelists ceased to exist after three of his notices in the Hippopotamus. The names of painters famous before his time you will not find in the largest dictionaries now. Four journalists committed suicide after he had burlesqued their syntax, and two statesmen resigned office owing to his masterly examination of their policy. We were all much shocked when a popular actor set fire to his theatre on a first night because Curtis and his dramatic critic refused to take champagne and chicken between the acts. This may give you some idea of Burrage's power in London.

"One day a curious change came over him. It was Monday when he and I were in the office receiving our instructions. Curtis, after going over some books, handed to Quentin a vellum-covered volume of poems, saying, with a grim smile: 'There are some more laurels for you to hash.' An expression of pain spread over Quentin's serene features. 'I'll see what I can do,' he said wearily. But his curious manner struck both Curtis and myself. The book was a collection of very indifferent verse, which already enjoyed a wide popularity. I cannot tell you the title, for that is a secret not my own. It was an early work of one of our most esteemed poets, who for some time was looked to, by his friends, as the natural successor to Tennyson. The Hippopotamus had not spoken. We were sometimes behindhand in our reviews. The public waited to learn if the new poet was really worth anything. You can imagine the general surprise when a week afterwards there appeared a flamingly favourable review of the poems. It made a perfect sensation and was quoted largely. The public became quite conceited with its foresight. The reputation of the poet was assured. 'The giant must be dead,' someone remarked in my hearing at the club, and members tried to pump me. One day a telegram came from Curtis asking me to go down to his house at once. A request from him was a command. I found him in a state of some excitement, his manner a little artificial. 'My dear Rivers, I suppose you think me mad. The geese have got into the Capitol at last.' Without correcting his classical allusion I said: 'Where is Burrage?' 'He is coming here presently. Of course, I glanced at the thing in proof and thought it a splendid joke, but, reading it this morning, I have come to the conclusion that something is wrong with Burrage. You remember his agitated manner the other day?' I was about to reply, when Burrage was announced. His haggard and pale appearance startled both of us. 'My dear Burrage, what is the matter with you?' we exclaimed simultaneously. He gave a sickly, nervous smile. 'Of course, you have sent to ask me about that review. Well, I have changed my views. I have altered. I think we should praise everything or ignore everything. To slate a book, good or bad, is taking the bread out of a fellow's mouth. I have been the chief sinner in this way, and I am going to be the first reformer.' 'Not in my paper,' said Curtis angrily.

"Then we all fell to discussing that old question with all the warmth that South and the rest of you were doing just now. We lost our tempers, and Curtis ended the matter by saying: 'I tell you what it is, Burrage; if you ever bring out a book yourself I'll send it to you to review. You can praise it as much as you like. But don't let this occur again with anyone else's work.' Burrage turned quite white, I thought, and Curtis, noticing the effect of his words, went up, and, taking him by the hand, added more kindly: 'My poor Burrage, are you quite well? I never saw you in so morbid a state before. All this is mere sentimentality—so different from your usual manly spirit. Go away for a change, to Brighton or Eastbourne, and you must come back with that wholesome contempt for your contemporaries that characterises most of your writings. I'll look over the matter this time, and we'll say no more about it.' And here Curtis was so overcome that he dashed a tear from his eye. A few hours later I saw Burrage off to the sea. He was very strange in his manner. 'I'll never be quite the same again. If I only dared to tell you,' he said. And the train rolled out of the station.

"Some weeks later I was again in the editorial room, and Curtis showed me a curiously bound book, printed on hand-made paper, entitled 'Prejudices.' I had already seen it. 'That book,' Curtis remarked, 'ought to have been noticed long ago. I was keeping it for Burrage when he gets better. Shall I send it to him?'

"'Prejudices' for some weeks had been the talk of London. It was a series of very ineffectual essays on different subjects. Sight, colour, sound, art, letters and religion were all dealt with in that highly glowing and original manner now termed Style. It was delightfully unwholesome and extraordinarily silly. Young persons had already begun to get foolish over it, and, leaving the more stimulating pages of Pater, they hailed the work as an earnest of the English Renaissance. Instead of stroking 'Marius the Epicurean' they fondled a copy of 'Prejudices.' I prophesied that Burrage would vindicate himself over it, and that the public would hear very little of 'Prejudices' in a year's time. The book was sent; and the first part of my prophecy was fulfilled; Burrage spared neither the author nor his admirers. The pedantry, the affected style, the cheap hedonism, were all pitilessly exposed. London rocked with laughter. Some of the admirers, with the generosity of youth, nobly came to the rescue. They made a paper war and talked of 'The cruelty and cowardice of the attack,' 'The stab in the dark,' 'Journalistic marauding,' 'Disappointed author turned critic.' The slate was one that I am bound to say was killing in both senses of the word. A less worthless book could never have lived under it. It was one of those decisive reviews of all ages. 'Prejudices' was withdrawn by the publisher, fearful of damaging his prestige. Yet it was never looked on as a rarity, and fell at book auctions for a shilling, for some time after, amidst general tittering. The daily papers meanwhile devoted columns to the discussion. I telegraphed to Burrage in cipher and congratulated him, knowing that secrets eke out sometimes through the post office. I was surprised to get no reply for some weeks, but Curtis said he was lying low while the excitement lasted. One day I got a letter simply saying: 'For God's sake, come. I am very ill.' I went at once. How shall I describe to you the pitiful condition in which I found him? The doctor told me he was suffering from incipient tuberculosis due to cerebral excitement and mental trouble. When I went in to see him he was lying in bed, pale and emaciated as a corpse, surrounded by friends and relations. He asked everyone to go out of the room; he had something of importance to say to me. I then learned what you have divined already. The anonymous author of 'Prejudices' was no other than Quentin Burrage himself, or, rather, not himself, but the other self of which neither I nor Curtis knew anything. He had been 'living a double life.' As a writer of trashy essays and verse, an incomplete sentimentalist surrounded by an admiring band of young ladies and gentlemen, he was not recognised as the able critic and the anonymous slater of the Hippopotamus. When he first received his own book to review he recalled the words of Curtis. He must be honest, impartial and just. No one knew better the faults of 'Prejudices.' As he began to write, the old spirit of the slater came over him. His better self conquered. He forgot for the moment that he was the author. He hardly realised the sting of his own sarcasm, even when he saw them in proof. It was not until it appeared and the papers were full of the controversy that the cruelty and unfairness of the attack dawned on him. I was much shocked at the confession, and the extraordinary duplicity of Burrage, who had been living a lie for ten years; and his denunciation of poor Curtis pained me. I would have upbraided him, but his tortured face and hacking cough made me relent. I need not prolong the painful story. Burrage never recovered. He sank into galloping consumption, only aggravated by a broken heart. I saw him on his deathbed at Rome. He was attended by Strange, and died in his arms. His last words to me were:

"Rivers, tell Curtis I forgive him."

"We buried him in the Protestant Cemetery next to Keats and Shelley. His sad death provoked a good deal of comment, as you may suppose; Curtis, of course, being blamed by the public. Strange has often promised to write his life. But he could never get through 'Prejudices,' and I pointed out to him that you can hardly write an author's life without reading one of his works, even though he did die in your arms. That is the worst of literary martyrs with a few brilliant exceptions; their works are generally dull."

"Is that all?" asked South.

"That is all, and I hope you understand the moral."

"Perfectly, but your reminiscences have too much construction, my dear Rivers."

"The story is perfectly true for all that," remarked the editor dryly.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE ROMANCE OF THE WRANGLER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—That England cares nothing for education is the tritest of sayings; and seldom is the saying better exemplified than upon the rare occasions when a spasmodic interest is aroused in the doings of one of the ancient universities. For the salient points on which the public seizes are almost invariably the least essential.

In the eyes of the British nation—or, rather, in the eyes of the nation's spokesman, the daily Press—the Valhalla of the noblest sons of Cambridge is the Mathematical Tripos. This is regarded, like the Derby, as a race for three-year-olds, a race for the Senior Wranglership. And again, as of old, Eclipse is first, and the rest nowhere. Each year the Senior Wrangler becomes, not indeed a nine-days' wonder, but a hero for part of a day, until, in fact, the two o'clock winner at Ascot shall oust him from his pride of place.

Now, how is this glamour that enwraps one solitary individual in one solitary tripos to be accounted for? It may be a relic of bygone days, for the Mathematical Tripos is the oldest of the honours schools. But it is hard to credit even British conservatism with such persistence; the Classical Tripos has been established for nearly a century, and at the present day there exist more avenues to academic honours than can be easily counted.

"To be a Senior Wrangler," the papers annually repeat, "is the opening of a brilliant career in life." Is this the case? Has it ever been the case? Ask any ordinary man to name a dozen Senior Wranglers of the nineteenth century. He could not name even half a dozen; probably not even two, or one. And in truth there are but eleven whose fame has had a chance of travelling beyond their own university and their own branch of learning, and the names of some of these are scarcely household words. Four astronomers there are, Herschell, Airy, Challis, Adams; three physicists, Stokes, Tait, and Lord Rayleigh; two lawyers, Lords Justice Romer and Fletcher Moulton; while Cayley (a doubtful competitor) and Todhunter complete the eleven. Colenso, Todhunter's companion in crime, was only Second Wrangler; a position also occupied by the two Thomsons, Maxwell, Whewell, and Lord Courtney of Penwith.

That high Wranglers lead useful lives afterwards there is not the shadow of a doubt; but fame and fortune seldom fall to the lot of a student. For brilliance of career it is necessary to refer to the Classical Tripos lists of the years from 1824 to 1882. In 1883 the arrangement of the names in order of merit ceases. Here we find heading the lists such famous divines as Selwyn, Wordsworth, Vaughan, Westcott, Perowne, and Lightfoot; headmasters such as Kennedy, Butler, Kynaston, Welldon, and the younger Westcott; three judges, Denman, Macnaghten, and Kennedy, and many other equally familiar names.

Another point on which much stress has been laid during the last few years is the absence of the representatives of the greater Public Schools, and many strange deductions have been made therefrom. "It is well," wrote a member of the staff of a much-circulated daily paper, "that ability is thus enabled to assert itself, and that poverty is now no bar to the highest academical and professional distinction. The success of the Board-school and Grammar-school boys is a symptom of national progress." One thinks at random of Becket and Wolsey, of Wood and Whewell, Green and Newton, Shakespeare and Keats, and wonders what part national progress and the County Council schools, to say nothing of the educational ladder, can have played in the academic and professional distinction of men such as these.

But, as a matter of fact, the Mathematical and Natural Science Triposes at Cambridge have always been regarded as the peculiar preserves of the poorer men, and socially speaking, have been looked down upon accordingly. In default of further evidence, a mathematical man is held to be probably an "outsider," and, as such, to be avoided until further evidence arrives. The higher Wranglers generally hail from the Scottish and provincial universities, and from the smaller grammar schools. Taking, for instance, as an average sample, the first six men in each of the years 1894, 1895, 1896, we find Marlborough represented twice and Eton once, while no other Public School occurs at all. The Scottish universities have three representatives, and the colleges at Liverpool and Belfast each one, while King Edward's School, Birmingham, Leatherhead, Coleraine, Liverpool Institute, Manchester Grammar School, and the London International College account for the remaining seven.

Since 1882 the Senior Wrangler has lost even the little significance that he may have possessed at an earlier period; for in that year an innovation was introduced, and the tripos was divided into two parts. Of these the first is now an examination in the more elementary parts of Mathematics. The second is taken a year later, if at all; but as it is not in any way necessary for a degree, it is only as a rule a few of the best men who enter for it. In this more advanced examination, rather than in the first part, success should be an indication of ability, and five times at least has it occurred that the Second Wrangler has beaten the Senior in the second part.

At the time of the introduction of these new regulations the Smith's Prize competition was also remodelled. Two of these prizes are awarded annually, and up to the year 1883 they were given as the result of an examination on the subjects of the Tripos itself. Under this unsatisfactory method of allotment it naturally happened nearly every time that the prizes went to the first two Wranglers, and it would have saved much trouble and led to practically the same result if the second competition had been dispensed with altogether. But for the last quarter of a century these prizes have been awarded, not as the result of examination, but to the authors of the two best theses in exemplification of original work done by the candidates themselves. In consequence, on ten occasions the Senior Wrangler has failed to win either prize; while in the year 1900 one of the prizes was obtained by the last but one of the Wranglers.

Now, if future brilliance is in any way foreshadowed by youthful academic success—and this is a doubtful proposition at best—it is safer to prophesy on the evidence of original work, rather than from pre-eminence in an examination. And in future, the British public, if it wishes momentarily to idolise the budding mathematician of the year, must devote itself exclusively to the study of the senior of the two Smith's Prizemen, for next year there will be no order of merit in the Tripos, and the Senior Wrangler and the Wooden Spoon will equally cease to exist.

NOTES ON SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

"That is, hot ice, and wondrous strange snow."—"A Midsummer Night's Dream, V. i. 59.

SIR,—In my edition of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ("Arden" Shakespeare, Methuen, 1905) I adopted the conjecture of Cartwright, stained, in lieu of the folio corruption strange, the epithet of "snow," as being "the least unsatisfactory of the many suggested readings" of the passage. Herein I was chiefly influenced by the probability that the necessary antithesis in Shakespeare's mind had reference to the colour of snow, and not to its coldness. Moreover, he had already in the play referred to the usual characteristic of snow (III., ii., 141), "That pure congealed white, high Taurus' snow." And the probability was somewhat increased by the fact that the correction of nearly every editor or critic proceeds on this hypothesis. It certainly does seem probable that Shakespeare might have used some epithet denoting colour, if we had any warrant for assuming that he had ever heard or read of coloured snow. In my note on the passage I observe that "in the Alps, and particularly in the Polar regions, snow is sometimes coloured red by the presence of innumerable small plants, consisting of brilliant red globules resting on a gelatinous mass. The plant is an Alga, and is known as the Protococcus nivalis. Red snow was observed in the Arctic expedition under Captain Ross in 1818 (see his narrative, 1819), extending along the cliffs on the shores of Baffin's Bay for eight miles, the red colour extending to a depth of twelve feet. If Shakespeare, as is probable enough, had read an account of this phenomenon in any of the descriptions of the old Arctic voyagers he would have been quick to utilise it, and hence it is no extravagant assumption to imagine that he might have written either 'stained' or 'orange' as an epithet of snow, signifying 'colour' without exactly defining it. Up to the present, however, no reference that I am aware of has been made to any passage of this kind in the old narratives." The phenomenon must have been known in Shakespeare's time, since Aristotle refers to it; and it is well-known at the present day. I find in a London daily paper of March 28, 1906, a paragraph that "snow of a reddish-brown colour has fallen on the banks of Lake Woerth in Corinthia. The phenomenon was accompanied by thunder and lightning and slight earthquake shocks." However, I am still unable to discover any authority which Shakespeare might have read, and which might warrant us in believing that he had utilised his knowledge in this passage to employ an attribute for snow denoting its colour.

I am now of opinion that the correct reading is "flaming snow," and that Shakespeare refers to nothing more abstruse than the phenomenon of a snow-clad volcano, like Hecla, Etna, or Teneriffe. He would have had no difficulty in ascertaining this phenomenon from the well-known volume of Hakluyt, "The Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques, and Discoveries of the English Nation, etc., by Richard Hakluyt, preacher and sometime student of Christ Church in Oxford. Imprinted at London by George Bishop, Ralph Newberie, and Robert Barker. Anno. 1599." The date of this volume is four or five years after that of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (1594-1595), but it must not be forgotten that it included the two smaller volumes, published by Hakluyt in 1582 and 1587, which Shakespeare had, beyond question, read and assimilated. In "A Preface to the Reader, etc.," of 1599 volume we find the following suggestive passages:—". . . as likewise of the continuall flaming of mountains, strange qualities of fountains . . ." and in "A Briefe Commentarie of Island

[i.e., Iceland] wherein, etc., By Arngrimur Jonas, of Island, (p. 556), the sixth Section," "There be in this Island mountaintains lift up to the Skies, whose tops being white with perpetuall snowe, their roots boile with everlasting fire. . . . As though in these kinds of inflammations (i.e., a marvellous eruption of smoke and fire) there did not concur causes of sufficient force for the same purpose . . . (p. 557). But yet there is somewhat more in these three fained mountains of Ifland, which causeth the sayd writers not a little to wonder, namely, whereas they say that their foundations are always burning, and yet for all that, their toppes be never defitute of snowe. Howbeit, it becometh not the authority and learning of such great clearkes to marueile at this, who can not but well knowe the flames of Mount Aetna, which (according to Plinie), being full of snowe all Winter, notwithstanding (as the same man wittetheth), it doth alwayes burne . . . What, if in Teneriffa (which is one of the Canarie or fortunate Ilands) the Pike so called, arising into the ayre, according to Munster, eight or nine Germane miles in height, and continually flaming like Aetna. . . ."

The necessary antithesis to "ice" is "hot"; and having regard to the above passages from Hakluyt it is in the highest degree probable that Shakespeare's thought did not change its course, but dwelt on the same antithesis as being applicable to snow—viz., heat; and that consequently he wrote flaming snow. In fact, the probability here is so strong that it amounts to a certainty. If we are to surrender the idea of a word denoting colour being an epithet of snow, there is no word other than flaming which so well fulfils the necessary conditions of sense and rhythm; and it is equally essential that the epithet should be disyllabic, as in no other passage in the plays does Shakespeare use the word "wondrous" except as a disyllable; and therefore we cannot treat it for metrical purposes as a trisyllable—i.e., "wonderous," if it is followed by a monosyllable like the Folio "strange," or "strong," or any similar word.

It is necessary to remember that such evidence as the foregoing does not deal with ascertained facts, but only with probabilities, however strong and convincing. As Bishop Butler says (p. 3 of the Introduction to his Analogy, vol. 1. Ed. Gladstone, 1896), "Probable evidence is essentially distinguished from demonstrative by this, that it admits of degrees; and of all variety of them, from the highest moral certainty to the very lowest presumption"; and (p. 5), "Probable evidence, in its very nature, affords but an imperfect kind of information . . . But to us probability is the very guide of life." And see chap. x. of Gladstone "Studies Subsidiary to Butler," p. 334.

HENRY CUNNINGHAM.

"SCIENTIFIC TOYS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Enclosed is a sheet issued along with a recent number of Harmsworth's "Children's Encyclopædia," and bearing what is described as a "scientific toy." It is alleged that a square divided into 64 small squares (Fig. 1) can be cut into pieces which, placed in position as in Fig. 2, will produce a rectangle containing 65 squares of the same size as the original 64; and we are told that the solution of the mystery "can only be that the space occupied by the line of the join, which runs from corner to corner, is equal to the space of the extra square."

It would take a clever man to cut the square as indicated by the dotted line in the top figure and place the pieces as indicated in the bottom one. They wouldn't fit; and it is only by deliberate false drawing that the second figure is produced. This latter is visibly absurd, and can easily be proved so: for the diagonal cut or join, which is supposed to be a straight line, passes from corner to corner (1) of a block of ten squares (five by two), (2) of a block of three squares (three by one), and (3) of a block of ten again; which is impossible, the block of ten and the block of three not being similar rectangles. Further, a line has no area, and therefore cannot be equal to the extra square; and, besides, there is more "line" in Fig. 1 than in Fig. 2. Still further, will Messrs. Harmsworth explain to the children, whom they profess to be educating, why, if they start by cutting up Fig. 2, and then place the pieces as in Fig. 1, they do not produce 66 squares, and so on ad infinitum?

I beg leave to protest, through your columns, against the dissemination among the young, in the name of science, of such manifest rubbish.

J. H. FRASER.

THE JOHNSON BICENTENARY CELEBRATION AT LICHFIELD.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—In connection with the bicentenary of the birth of Dr. Samuel Johnson, it is proposed to hold an Exhibition of Johnsonian Manuscripts, Books, Portraits, Pictures, Relics, etc., at Lichfield, in September next.

As Mayor of the City, I have been asked to appeal to all those who possess memorabilia of our great citizen to allow them to be placed on public view on that occasion. To make the Exhibition as representative and reminiscent as possible, it has been resolved to allow books, papers and articles to be sent either on loan or sale. All goods will be adequately insured, and the utmost care exercised to prevent damage and to return them in safety to their owners.

I venture, therefore, to ask all lovers of Johnson to co-operate in this undertaking, and to assist in making the Exhibition worthy of the name and fame of the great man of letters whose memory we desire to commemorate.

All communications should be addressed to the Town Clerk, Guildhall, Lichfield, by whom every information will be given.

H. M. MORGAN,
Mayor of Lichfield.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome:—

Sir,—I see that you are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,

sgd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

By the Author of "The Log of a Sailorman."

(4) OVER BRAVE BLUE SEAS

By WILL BROOKE. [Shortly].
In his new work Mr. Will Brooke presents a realistic account of a sailor's life; his wanderings and adventures by land and sea from the time of his first voyage in a sailing vessel until he obtains command of an ocean-going steamship. The toil, the strife, the humour and pathos of life on the great waters are depicted in intensely vivid and striking language. A sailor by profession, Mr. Brooke has gifts of insight, imagination, observation and description that are usually associated only with the born storyteller.

LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS'S SONNETS AND THE "TIMES"

It is usual for publishers to make considerable play with "first reviews," particularly when they happen to be favourable reviews. The Academy Publishing Company published on Thursday last a book of SONNETS by LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS, and with that great enterprise which so distinguishes it the "TIMES" of Thursday apportioned to the book its first review. Here it is in letters of gold :

"These [meaning the Sonnets] are marked by accomplishment in the sonnet form."

Of such noble and generous praise author and publishers alike may well be proud. The "Times" has spoken the truth, and the ACADEMY PUBLISHING CO. ventures to believe that the public which cares for verse will consequently hasten to purchase through their booksellers what is left of the first edition of the SONNETS. The price is still 2/6 net, though the encomiums of the "Times" might well have justified an increase.

PRICE THREEPENCE

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"... He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible hitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chalonier believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chalonier goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horseshoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

'A fecund sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly bags and matrons fair!
His votresses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chalonier steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, Roanoke Rapids, North Carolina, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spang'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Gleeks—who then they speak one bears the graven-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse,
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!

But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a sour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chalonier to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1908.

LIFE AND LETTERS

We do not gather that G. B. Shaw's outburst of indignation against the Licensor of Plays has brought any ponderable amount of grist to his mills, even in the shape of sympathy. In spite of the cocoa-fed Nonconformist Nation and the cocoa-fed Nonconformist Daily News, the intellectual feeling of the country is entirely with Mr. Redford. Shaw has succeeded only in showing up himself for a person who has little or no respect for the natural decencies, and his rash supporters in the Press have succeeded only in bringing upon themselves the condemnation of their own readers. Nobody can doubt that the passage from Mr. Shaw's play, which we quoted in these columns last week, was, to say the least of it, an undesirable passage, and a passage which could serve no useful purpose to anybody. The Nation's contention that it was essential to Mr. Shaw's dramatic expression of himself is simply nonsense, and it indicates quite plainly that the Nation's estimate of Mr. Shaw's powers as a dramatist is not flattering to Mr. Shaw. The merest knocker together of crude melodramas for the three night bookings in the provinces could have got all the dramatic effect Mr. Shaw can possibly hope to obtain out of Blanco Posnet's wicked speech without employing language to which official objection could be taken. But the fact is that in passages of the type in question Mr. Shaw does not really aim at dramatic effect at all. His intention is to shock rather than to move, and though people may prattle about his dramatic artistry till they be black in the face, it is impossible to get away from the obvious facts. We trust that the general upshot of the matter will serve as a lesson alike to Mr. Shaw, Mr. Massingham and the editor of the Daily News. The agitation for the abolition of the censorship is an agitation to which no sane person can lend support. We are told that there is no censorship over literature, and that, consequently, there should be no censorship over the drama. In point of fact, however, there is an ultimate censorship over literature, which censorship takes the unpleasant form of prosecutions at Bow Street, instead of refusal to license. We believe that the managers of theatres and that actors and the theatre-going public as a whole will be found to be more or less in accord with the present system. When the licensor of plays has passed any given dramatic work the manager may produce his play with a perfectly easy mind and the performers may play their parts with an equally easy mind and the theatre-goer may buy his seats in the full assurance that he will be spared anything in the way of exhibitions of downright unseemliness and impropriety. If the censor were abolished nobody could be sure about anything. We believe that out of a desire to accommodate the supposed public demand for the discussion of this, that or the other "problem" on the stage the censor has more than once licensed the performance of plays which the police would have stopped if there had been no censor. And we are sure that the abolition of the censorship will be the signal for an outbreak of unseemliness, undesirability and prurience the like of which has never before been witnessed in England.

It is singular that the supporters of the agitation against the censor are for the most part puling and unacted dramatists—many of them mere children, not to say minor poets. They have failed utterly in literature and in journalism, and even in musical comedy. As for writing a competent drama, they know that the job is entirely beyond them, and they have the good sense not to attempt it. But it is always open to them to make an excursion into cheap pornography and to bring the result under the notice of the censor, who, of course, promptly "turns it down," and by that act installs our beautiful young dramatic author among the martyrs for all time. This, to our mind, is the only real drawback to the censorship; but it is a small affair and we shall not weep over it. Of course, if the control of the drama, like the control of literature, were to pass into the hands of the police our young friends would shriek horribly. So that looking at the circumstances as a whole it were perhaps best that well should be left alone. Meanwhile, the censor has got the best of Shaw once again, and nobody is sorry.

Mr. St. Loe Strachey, of the Spectator, has begun the climbing-down process. In a long article, entitled "Confirmation and Communion," he trots out once more the stale arguments of Nonconformity and Latitudinarianism as to what is intended by certain rubrics and canons of the Church, and assures us that because these rubrics and canons are "habitually violated" the rubric in regard to Confirmation and the Communion should also be violated. Our contemporary goes even to the length of asserting that "the rubric in regard to Confirmation is one where it is extremely doubtful whether what we may call the technical and pedantic interpretation is really valid." Here we have a guarded statement, if you will, but it is the kind of statement in which the Spectator is ever ready to indulge when occasion serves it. Mr. Strachey's article will not deceive or throw dust into the eyes of plain churchmen. It contains, however, what Mr. Strachey no doubt considers a very choice final appeal, to which we must take grave exception. Here is Mr. Strachey's appeal:

We feel bound to say there seems to us something, if not blasphemous, at any rate wholly inconsistent with the spirit of Christianity in arguing such a point as this as if it were solely a point of law and not of religion. But if it is essentially not a point of Church law but a point of Christianity that is being considered, can any man who looks into his own conscience, and who desires to do the will of God as it is found in the Gospels and the teaching of Christ, really doubt what would be the will of our Lord in such a matter? Would our Lord have repelled any man from His side, from His gifts, and from His ministrations on a punctilio, on a point of law, on a matter of ritual? Would He, who told the ritualists of His day that they laid on men burdens too heavy to be borne, have given His approval to those whose misdirected zeal prompts them to shut, as they believe, the gates of heavenly mercy upon all who did not conform with rigid accuracy to the rubric? We, at any rate, cannot read the Gospel or the will of Jesus in any such sense as that. If we look to the spirit of our Lord's teaching we shall surely find, not repulsion but embracement, not exclusion but inclusion. What we said at the beginning of this controversy we must say again. We are neither theologians nor ecclesiastical lawyers, and we, of course, make no pretence to a monopoly of Christian truth. We will not condemn Pharisaism in the spirit of the Pharisees. But at least we have a right, as Englishmen, to ask other Englishmen, whether bishops or clergymen or laymen, to remember so to be churchmen as not to forget they are Christians.

The subtleties here set forward are very subtle indeed. Mr. Strachey knows as well as we know that if we begin to enquire as to what our Lord would have done in this, that or the other circumstance Nonconformity at least might find itself in a very awkward situation indeed. There is no question of embracement or repulsion involved in the present argument. Nobody is suggesting that Mr. Strachey's friends are not Christians, or that they are indifferent Christians, or that our Lord would repulse them. But to say that the next Nonconformist, merely for the purpose of suiting his own whim and convenience, has any sort of right—legal, moral, Christian or otherwise—to insist that the Church of England shall abolish or loosely interpret her rubrics and canons is sheer nonsense. If a High Churchman insisted in taking part in a Wesleyan class meeting or a Wesleyan love-feast there would be a bitter outcry; yet there is nothing in the constitution or laws of Methodism to prevent such participation. And when a churchman happens to reside six miles from the nearest church, he travels the six miles when he wishes to go to church rather than disturb the close handy Methodist conventicle. If the good soul for whom Mr. Strachey is taking all this trouble and setting up all this speciousness will look at matters in a serious, impartial and Christian light we think that she will recognise that the best thing she can do is to be confirmed with all convenient dispatch, and thus become a proper member of the church for which she is evidently possessed of an admirable affection.

Our old friend Mr. Shorter has been at it again. He informs us in the current number of his paper that "long before their deaths, both Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Meredith had reached the position of classic writers with regard to their first editions and also their autographs." Whether they were classic writers in the literary sense is, of course, no affair of Mr. Shorter's. It seems that some of Mr. Meredith's handwriting has been found to be more valuable than the first editions of his novels, "by the test of the auction room," and that "a few weeks before he died a single letter was sold for £5," which is stupendous reading. The market in first editions and autographs is no doubt important from Mr. Shorter's point of view, and it is quite natural that a critic who is apparently incapable of distinguishing good writing from bad should fall back on a sort of paragraphic book-prices-current when a great man dies. In the meantime it is interesting to note that Mr. Shorter "sincerely trusts that Mr. Thomas Hardy may be the next recipient of the Order of Merit." We have nothing but admiration for Mr. Thomas Hardy in some of his phases, but we may promise Mr. Shorter that we shall never read of Thomas Hardy, O.M. There are lions in the way; besides which it seems to us highly probable that Mr. Hardy would not accept such an honour, even if it were proffered to him. The Order of Merit business might suit some of our clever popular novelists; but it can have no attractions whatever for a competent literary person.

There is a rumour abroad that Mr. Watts-Dunton proposes to hand over to the Royal Literary Fund the goodly number of thousands of pounds bequeathed to him by Mr. Swinburne. For our own part, we sincerely hope that Mr. Watts-Dunton will do nothing of the kind. If he wishes to honour the memory of Swinburne he can easily accomplish his purpose without troubling the Royal Literary Fund, which is not by any means an ideal organisation, and which would also appear to have funds enough and to spare when mediocrity is concerned. A separate and independent Swinburne fund, which would provide suitable pensions or grants for capable poets, would be far more honourable to the name of Swinburne. We are rather astonished that Mr. Swinburne did not provide for something of this sort before his death; but probably he felt that the matter would be handled more satisfactorily by his lifelong friend. Of course, the matter lies entirely with Mr. Watts-Dunton, and nobody would blame him if he did nothing.

The Nation is advertising itself as "the best and brightest of the weeklies." Now, if anybody had at any time so described the Nation there might be some reason in the advertisement, but Mr. Massingham does not quote his "best and brightest of the weeklies," and, in point of fact, the legend has been bestowed upon and belongs to another paper, the name of which modestly forbids us to mention. However, in order to give Mr. Massingham a good run for his money we have inspected number ten, volume five of his cocoa-fied sheet, and we are quite certain that it is not in the least bright and that even the poor old Outlook is a good deal better. Here is a sample of bestness and brightness, which we cull from one of the Nation's middle pages:

Following up his book on "No. 10 Downing Street" Mr. Charles Eyre Pascoe has just finished a volume on similar lines dealing with "Admiralty House, Whitehall," the official residence for over two hundred years of the First Lord of the Admiralty. Its history may be traced back to the Duke of Buckingham of Charles I.'s reign, and it contains a large number of portraits and other relics of historic interest.

Again:

We understand that a monthly literary review will be issued in October next, under the direction of Mr. T. P. O'Connor. The aim of the new venture is, we believe, to deal in popular style with the literature of the month. It will contain critical sketches of notable authors, book reviews, and gossip about all that relates to the world of letters.

On the whole, this is pretty good for sixpennyworth of the "best and brightest," particularly as it appears under the heading of the "World of Books." And it seems to us more than doubtful if either of the paragraphs we have quoted was written in the office of the Nation. Every editor receives from the publishers a hundred such paragraphs every week, and he merely waste-paperbaskets them. Mr. Massingham prefers to retail them for sixpence. It is true that out of the paragraph about Mr. T. P. O'Connor's forthcoming literary monthly sparkling copy might have been made, but Mr. Massingham dare not make it. The truth about T.P. and "literature" by W. H. Massingham might create strife at that well-known pothouse, the National Liberal Club. T. P. announced at a meeting of the Imperial Press Conference the other afternoon that he had never found himself able to discover the difference between literature and journalism. We are not astonished; neither is Mr. Massingham. Leaving the Nation's paragraphs for the Nation's poetry, which should be the chief thing, we come across two sublime stanzas "from the Chinese." The last of them concludes as follows:

The pencil falters and the song is naught,
Her beauty, like the sun, dispells my thought.

We have read better stuff in the "books" of traveling pantomimes. And the price is only sixpence! It is lucky for the Rowntrees that their chocolate is excellent.

Messrs. Bottomley and Vivian are becoming quite pathetic. One of them—we should not like to wager which of them—writes in the current John Bull as follows:

Everybody who is worth his place in the world performs a hundred or a thousand services for his fellows, for which he never asks and never expects and never gets a farthing payment. In all service for humanity there is an element of sacrifice.

We have heard of shares being sold at an enormous sacrifice, and on a warranty similar in kind to the warranty that so-and-so's pills are worth a guinea a box. The editor of John Bull, it seems, is convinced that the John Bull League for the extirpation of kill-joy, humbug and cant is going to be a big thing. If it can extirpate the humbug and cant which appears from week to week in John Bull it will indeed have performed a notable service. Bottomley and Vivian, not to say Odhams and Elias, as the executioners of "cant and hypocrisy in every shape" undoubtedly fire the imagination, particularly after their fearful exposure of the mud-stained condition of English justice, and their courageous endeavours to heap contempt upon Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, V.C., because of his piety.

Curious things happen in the publishing trade. Some day possibly we shall find an author of the temperament of Isaac Disraeli compiling a book on the Romance of Publishing, and the Fairy Tales of Paternoster Row. But strive as we will to overlook the fact the book manufacturer is a person who delights in the curious situation. Examples will readily occur to the initiated. It is romantic that A. should publish B.'s books and elope with B.'s wife. We do not say that the thing has been done; but it would be romantic and a distinct change from the usual practice of dissipating B.'s royalties and going bankrupt. Apart from this kind of romance, however, we are face to face at the present moment with a publishing romance of the first order, in which romance at least three, if not four, more or less respectable publishing houses are concerned. In the eye of the public these four publishing houses are very distinct and separate affairs. Two of them publish fairly naughty or foolish books and declare very fat dividends in consequence. The other two hold up hands of pious horror at the bare idea of naughty books and are entirely for religion and the world well lost. Yet on close examination it will be found that the men behind these concerns are delicately inter-related and inter-connected. For example, the head and front of one of the religious, high-toned houses is a large shareholder in one of the grub-along, foolish, low comedian, anything-for-money houses, and thus pays to Peter the large dividends which he receives from Paul. We have a proper number of striking facts at our disposal with reference to this matter, but we will forbear for the time being.

THE PAGEANT

SEE how Life moves, a cunning-fashioned mask,
A tale unfolded, quaint and full of meaning,
Where some look on and of each other ask
What new surprise the masquer Time is screening:

And others at his prompting play their parts
Of tragical dismay or April gladness;
Fate comes like June with roses to their hearts,
Or wraps them in a winding-sheet of sadness.

When music sounds be ready for a measure;
Muster up all your grace, and you may win
Rewards that fall not unto every wight:
Nor question why some watch and laugh at leisure,
Nor why all evermore come newly in,
And evermore go out into the night.

ROSEBERY, MORLEY & CO.

AT a more or less recent house-warming in Oxford Street the abounding Mr. Gordon Selfridge explained to a company of journalists that he was pleased and proud to see them, inasmuch as he had always considered himself to be three-parts a journalist. The journalists, for their part, might have retorted quite fittingly that journalists though they might appear to be, they were really three-parts drapers. And such a retort might have saved us all a great deal of trouble, and might have kept Lord Rosebery, and Lord Morley and Co. in particular, from having so much to say at the various dinners and meetings of what is now called the Imperial Press Conference. Far be it from us to offer a cold shoulder or a stock-fish hand to the sundry worthy journalists and their wives—from "overseas"—who during the past few days have made such havoc with the White City claret and the Sutton Place early peas. Gentlemen who run newspapers "overseas," or, as a decent person would put it, in the Colonies, are no doubt just as good and just as "charming to meet" as other people from "overseas," and it is quite possible that they are also really profound publicists, not to say, Empire-builders, and "custodians of the language of Shakespeare and Burns," whatever that may mean. Lord Rosebery, with an effusiveness smacking properly of the loving-cup, has bid them "Welcome Home," and Lord Rosebery may be presumed to know what he is about. On the other hand, nobody acquainted with the subject can have perused the multifarious lists of the names of persons who are taking part in our yeasty Imperial Press celebrations without indulging a feeling of mild astonishment, mingled, perhaps, with a dash of the emotion of gratitude; for there can be no doubt in the world that whatever may be the intellectual status and literary and philosophical parts of our Colonial visitors, the intellectual status and literary and philosophical parts of the indigenous section of the Conference are not calculated to dazzle one. In point of fact, and so far as the journalistic sons of the Mother Country are concerned, the functions and meetings have of necessity taken pretty much the form of so many Sunday-school treats, which are being attended with a sort of condescension by our Roseberys and our Morleys, and a sprinkling of duchesses and society people, whose interest really lies more in the crush than in the Press, and who, beautiful as they may appear in the eyes of the gaping journalists, are not exactly fitted by either education or intention to be the saviours of their country. In order that we may more vividly illustrate the situation we take from a report of a garden party, "arranged in honour of the Imperial Press Delegates," the following sublime words:

Buffets were set up in several of the rooms, and tea and coffee and all kind of light refreshments were on hand.

It is impossible for us to assert roundly what "all kinds of light refreshments" may or may not have included. But this simple sentence brings to our recollection a semi-private evening party arranged by a great lady in a great house for the benefit of a certain charity. For this affair the Press were invited on appealing gilt-edged, properly-crested paper, and, recognising, no doubt, that it was the chance of a lifetime, sundry influential newspapers put down their best and brightest to represent them on the eventful evening. So that, instead of receiving a few hundred two-pound-a-week reporters, the great lady in question really received a considerable number of able editors, and, for that matter, even two or three real live bloated newspaper proprietors. We need scarcely say that "buffets were set up in several of the rooms," and that "tea and coffee and all kinds of light refreshments were on hand." Sailing gracefully up to one of these buffets, a gentleman of high editorial rank, and a notorious Empire-builder, demanded of the venerable feudal servitor at the back of the bar a small item in the way of a whisky and soda. The venerable servitor eyed our Empire-builder with a perfectly menial and subservient eye, and remarked: "I am very sorry, sir, but 'er Grace 'as given orders that no whisky is to be served to the Press." There were ructions of a highly decorous kind, and after the whisky had been produced the Empire-builder left it untasted and left the house. This is less than five short years ago. It was a small matter, but it showed rather painfully which way the wind blows in certain minds when journalism is concerned. Thanks to the efforts of the hapenny Press, we have clearly changed all that. Lord Rosebery comes to dine with us, and makes the "oration of his life" for our honour and glory. Lord Morley comes to talk to us, and concludes another "oration of his life" with the remark: "I am very proud to have met you, and I am always very proud to have been a member of your profession." We can assure these worthy noblemen that they are both of them wasting their delicate breath; there is no glory and honour about journalism, and a man who says that he is proud to meet journalists is simply doing his best to be courteous; while as to being proud "to have been a member of your profession" Lord Morley ceased to be a member of the journalist profession in time to preserve absolutely unimpaired his colossal ignorance of it. These are the short, sharp, ungetoverable facts, and we commend them to Lord Rosebery and to Lord Morley and the rest of them. There is not a practical journalist in England who is not giggling in his sleeve over the whole business.

It may be that the Imperial Press Conference has further meetings to hold and further soirees to attend, and if further eminent orators are down on the bill we shall offer them a few words of advice. Lord Rosebery and Lord Morley have convinced the world at large that they are exceedingly nice gentlemen, but that their contempt for journalism is really profound. Lord Rosebery has never been a journalist, but for all that it is safe to credit him with a small amount of intelligence, particularly as he happens to be a person of some literary parts. Yet he goes to the White City in the spirit of an alderman on a reception committee. He has nothing but praise of the most treacly and dumplingy kind for the Press in all parts of the King's dominions, which, as his lordship professes to conceive it, is the finest, most creditable and most immaculate affair under the sun, and he bids us drink bumpers to it. Lord Morley, for his part, is an equally blind and crapulous worshipper. Of the true inwardness of the journalism of the moment we will presume him to know next to nothing. On the other hand, he can read, and he also happens to be a person of literary parts. Further, he confesses to having heard rumours as to the unsatisfactory and discreditable condition of the newspaperdom of the moment; yet he affects a sane and humorous scepticism. There is nothing wrong with the Press; the man with his hapenny paper—and if he be of an æsthetic turn of mind, his illustrated paper—is a sane, sound, honest person whom it is impossible to corrupt or demoralise, and who is simply being given what is best for him by your high-minded public-spirited, philanthropic hapenny newspaper proprietor. We shall only reply to Lord Morley in the words which he himself quotes: "My brother, we beseech you to think it possible that you may be mistaken," and our advice to elderly noblemen who may have in preparation orations for the remaining meetings of the Imperial Press Conference is that a few words of honest criticism would be of much more worth to the country just now than tons of bouquets and fawning and soft speeches.

POETRY AND DEMOS

FROM time to time attempts are made to establish for poetry, as well as for other forms of imaginative art, a test which shall depend upon widespread popular appreciation, and although nothing is easier than to defeat such attempts they often recur. If they were made only by unthinking persons they might well be neglected, but the heresy is often adopted by men of superior understanding, and occasionally even by men whose principal concern in life is literature. The arch offender among these is Count Tolstoi, who, in "What is Art?" upholds the proposition that all art not understood and appreciated by the masses is bad and counterfeit.

False views are based less commonly upon altogether false foundations than upon truth misapprehended or partly seen; indeed, the same fundamental perception may inspire both true and false statements upon any matter. Thus, those who say falsely, "Good poetry ought to be such as everyone can understand," are putting a truth backward, and should rather say, "Everyone ought to understand good poetry."

It is not difficult to understand how the heresy arises. It will be admitted by all who love poetry that at the present time in England a true appreciation of it is excessively rare. Those whose professional duty it is to pass some kind of judgment upon contemporary verse are helpless when any new volume appears. The majority of reviewers are guided by one golden rule, depending upon the rarity of good poetry: except under special circumstances, condemn all new verse. This they do, and in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred they are right, though they do not know why. Yet so timid are they that if but one voice of any strength is raised in praise they all follow like sheep, so that about once in each year, or perhaps more rarely, a new verse-writer is hailed as a poet. It may sometimes happen that the newcomer is truly an inspired singer, and that the word of recognition was spoken by a true judge; and then, many are the pitfalls for these critics. Unless they should be so fortunate as to learn from their leader what they should admire, they will certainly, if they venture upon quotation, choose the poorest lines from the volume, and offer them as an example of the poet's quality. And to pass from these professional critics to the general public, here the same ignorance is found. Among the widest section of the public two views commonly prevail: the one, that poetry is an idle triviality with which a sensible man need not, or perhaps should not concern himself; the other, that its proper function is the direct expression in verse of estimable sentiments, such as patriotism, paternal or filial love and the like, or of the most luscious sentimentality. Above these comes a much smaller and yet considerable class of persons who—generally in early youth—consider any high-sounding lines, especially of the descriptive kind, to be beautiful. A still smaller class admires fine, skilful verse, especially if it bear evidence of a scholarly mind. And among all these persons the statement that a profound gulf exists between the simplest stanza of poetry and the most correct, skilful, and dignified verse that can be composed by a writer of refined taste and scholarly acquirements, is regarded either as nonsense, or as the irritating pose of the "superior person," although in the last class a few sophisticated persons will be found who are aware that such a difference is held to exist, but are not able to understand it.

But notwithstanding all this ignorance, there is a widespread, though not universal, belief that in very truth poetry is one of the noble and delightful things of life. There are many blameless households in which finely-bound, but—alas!—unread copies of the works of the poets are kept, perhaps from an obscure feeling that the mere possession of them is creditable, and forms a bond between their owners and spheres too high for them. There are many excellent persons to whom the names of Shelley and Keats are of sweet savour, though they know not their works. The great newspapers, dedicated to the practical affairs of life, sacrifice columns of their space when a poet, whom they have been taught to consider great, is dead; and, however blindly and blunderingly, pay to him and to poetry their tribute of honour. For after all, those who know and love poetry have not been silent; their delight has been spoken again and again, and the public has heard their praises. It is seen that the memory of the poet has a life more vivid and enduring than kings and statesmen can claim. It is seen that some few persons, not foolish or without authority, preserve for the works left by the poets a high and almost holy enthusiasm. Above all, it is seen that the praises showered upon the poets are of a kind which few other men can win; and yet are of the kind that every man who has anything good in him would wish, in his secret heart, that he might be capable of winning. It is recognised widely, however faintly and dimly, that the beauty which is prized in poetry is akin to all the finest elements in the nature of man; and so there still exists a great body of persons who hold poetry in a reverence which, though it is weak because it is not allied with understanding, is yet enduring because it is the product of the better parts of their nature. It is similar to, and in the same way estimable as the respect in which great numbers of persons, not themselves religious, continue to hold religion.

It is natural, especially in a day when, for good or evil, more or less democratic theories hold the field, that among those who are aware of these two facts, the general incapacity to step into the enchanted regions of poetry, and the widespread belief that these regions are delightful to man, there should be some who wonder at, and some who resent the apparent exclusion from such delight of the great mass of men. From such wonder and such resentment spring two schools, both, I believe, mistaken; that which holds that poetry is an esoteric mystery belonging as of right to a chosen few, and regards almost as intrusive and impertinent the wistful glances cast at their garden by those who would but cannot enter, and that which demands that the garden be thrown open to all. It is with the last only that we are here concerned. They put forward a false syllogism. They promise truly that poetry is delightful to the soul of man, and that the most of mankind do not taste its delight, and conclude falsely that the nature of poetry is to be changed, and that it is to be lowered to the comprehension of the many.

I know not how far among lovers of poetry the following will be accepted: that poetic feeling, emotion the same in kind though not in degree as that of the poet in his sublimest moment, is not rare, but common to the extent that those who never know it, though they are many, are yet the minority. Is it not true that every fine emotion of the human heart is in its essence poetic? That man, however "practical," who will pause in involuntary admiration when he comes unexpectedly upon a beautiful scene, is capable of poetic emotion; he is, in some faint and dim degree, a poet. The beauty of the landscape does not please him, as some would have it, merely because its harmony is grateful to his nerves and brain. He is not critical, and knows nothing of the mechanic laws of composition, nor of the values of tones and shades. If he has any true pleasure, however fleeting, however quickly obscured by the commoner activities of his mind, it is because he has a sense of beauty: there is something in the landscape, not to be identified with its material parts, though conveyed to him by them, which seems to him strange, magical and suggestive. This feeling, from which is derived the whole of such pleasure as he gains, he cannot express; if he could do so he would be, in very truth, a poet. If his pleasure is great he will perhaps say baldly to his companion, "That is beautiful!"; and it may sometimes happen that he will go on, in his wish to communicate the pleasure which he has felt, and endeavour to pick out the features in the landscape which he may call especially beautiful. But such conversation soon dies, and not only for the plain and obvious reason that such a man is not much interested in beauty. It is felt vaguely that it is unsatisfactory. It is not what is wanted. It is not poetry. That is why most people talk rarely, and sensible people never, of the pleasure which beauty of any kind gives them. It is felt instinctively by all, that such pleasure cannot be communicated by ordinary methods of speech, however skilfully used; it cannot be contained within the terms of statement and description, and by too many it is concluded that it cannot in any way be communicated. It is not too much to say that the vast mass of people are unaware that the function of poetry is to express, with a sweetness and intensity far beyond their power to imagine, those strange and magical suggestions which, for some rarely, for others more often, enhance and glorify their perception of the material realities of Earth with a spiritual perception of beauty. They do not know, and could hardly be persuaded, that when they try feebly to communicate their own pleasure in beauty of any kind, and fail, they give evidence of their own and the common human need for poetry.

If this be true, if poetry is indeed the expression of emotions common to most of the human race, then there is an end to the pretensions of those who would have it a mystery. There is an end, also, to the claims of those who, because it is not comprehended of the many, would have it leave its proper functions to serve others. Their demand that the garden should be thrown open to all is idle, for it lies open already.

But yet the many do not enter. That very man whom we have imagined, who can receive some touch of poetic pleasure from beauty, has no care for poetry. He does not, it is true, know what poetry is: he has a false notion of its functions. But if he did know he would still not care for it. He values such pleasure too lightly to be at any pains to secure it. He thinks it idle, and puts a thousand things above it, some important, some trivial. Grosser pleasures, more easily obtained, please him better. This is true of the world: there is no such strongly-felt and widespread desire for poetic pleasure as might lend a sentimental if not a reasonable force to the claims of those who hold that poetry should submit to the test of popularity. Although the poetic faculty is not an abnormal one, although it is a constant element of human nature, yet in the vast majority of men in the present day it is so weak, so atrophied, that they feel no necessity for satisfying its claims.

So, by far the larger part of the world's indifference to poetry must be set down to this weakness of the poetic instinct in most persons: yet ignorance also plays its part. It is not intended to offer here an educational recipe for the universal inculcation of a true appreciation of poetry, yet it may be said that education might do something. Cannot poetry, after all, be defined? Would it not be possible to teach the average human being two things, the first, that it is the function of poetry to convey such poetic emotion as he can and does experience, though in a higher and intensified degree; the second, that he must not expect to find such emotion communicated in poetry as in his own familiar vehicle of prose, by statement and description? Could he not be made to understand something of that indirect suggestion which is the essence of lyrical poetry? And for a last question, would not this lessen the impatience with which the inept sees that poetry is not what he expected in that it does not give him the plain statements for which he looked; and might not this open the door to at least a few who alone will never find their way into the garden?

TACITUS

The Annals of Tacitus. Books XI. to XVI. An English translation, with introduction, notes, and maps. By GEORGE GILBERT RAMSAY. (John Murray.)

MOST men remember nothing about school but incidents of school life; their minds when they were school-boys are blotted out as if they had belonged to a former unknown existence. The few to whom their youthful ideas are still only the distant prelude to their present ideas, will probably recall their relief when they escaped from Livy to Tacitus, especially if they possessed more native wit than latinity, and especially again in cases where masters had not by that stage of their instruction stamped out with grammars any taste for literature which had been born in them. Livy was and probably still is, particularly exasperating to such boys. He lures them by easy stages into a sudden fog of confused sentences. Men who have such memories will first sympathise with Professor Ramsay for pointing out that when Livy pretends to be accurate, he is hopelessly inconsistent. His record of Hannibal's passage of the Alps is consequently valueless. Next they will sympathise with Professor Ramsay for again exposing the enemy of their remoter childhood, Cæsar, who disgusted them by thinking confusedly in spite of his preciser language. They found it incredible that the author of the Gallic War was the great man that he is represented to have been, and either doubt it still, or pretend that all his works were written by Hirtius. Professor Ramsay notices that Cæsar is often nearly as vague about his own business as Livy is about Hannibal's. Tacitus comes to such boys like a saviour; it is impossible to pretend that he cared a fig for grammarians. He used Latin as he chose; he obliterates grammarians. They can no longer conceal ideas by their inept rules, for Tacitus has power of laying hold upon his readers' minds, which no schoolmaster nor grammarian can hinder. No Latin writer, scarcely another in any language, possesses it in the same degree, except Dante and perhaps Shakespeare. When the mind has once been emancipated from grammar it is not difficult to seize the meaning of Tacitus. His concentration is so intense that it compels comprehension. To young Ishmaelites craving for bread he comes as the confounder of those who have hitherto compounded it chiefly of gravel. Professor Ramsay is just now at once the guardian, the evangelist, and the high priest of the oracle. He defends the text, he expounds, and he admires. His English version will send back many early admirers to the Latin text, and they will gratefully rejoice with him in the completion of his long and very difficult task.

As regards the text of the Annals, Professor Ramsay explains that we owe our knowledge practically to one manuscript, Medicean M.S.A., for the first ten books, and Medicean M.S.B. for books eleven to sixteen. But Med.B is exceedingly difficult to decipher, consequently until recently the printed texts of the later books were more or less accommodated to grammarians' rules. Professor Ramsay has used the great edition of Mr. Furneaux, whose "sane and cautious judgement" he has "learnt more and more to respect"—revised, as to the text, by Mr. C. D. Fisher. He considers the Fisher-Furneaux text (F2) now probably the best in existence. This is what he says:

Mr. Fisher has done good service by clinging tenaciously to the readings of Med. wherever possible. He might perhaps have gone even further in this direction; for whenever the reading of Med. can be deciphered, and presents a construction not impossible [Professor Ramsay might have written "comprehensible by me"] it is safer to assume that Tacitus may have used an unusual or unknown construction than to pronounce that MS. corrupt. I have myself ventured, for reasons given in the notes, to accept the readings of Med. rather than those adopted by F2 and others, in the following passages.

He then indicates some fifteen passages, which show the wisdom of the course which he has taken. It must not be supposed that the scribe of Med. was infallible, nor that Professor Ramsay is uncritical, for he frequently corrects obvious clerical errors, but his very distinct preference for Tacitus before grammarians is the first excellence of his book. As he points out, Tacitus's style is closely condensed; it is not confused like Livy's, nor unphilosophical in the use of words, like Cæsar's.* Tacitus's style was intentional, and to tamper with it is to obscure his mind. Hence comes the enormous difficulty of Professor Ramsay's task, and the constant demand through centuries for interpretations of Tacitus, couched in the terms most expressive at the moment, which are also able to reflect his mind most accurately.

An idea of the interest and scope of these later books of the Annals can be given best by quoting at length from Professor Ramsay's admirable Introduction:

These books admit us to the private councils of Emperors, to the intrigues of the Palace, to the proceedings of the Senate, and to the State secrets of the time; they show us how luxuriously the great Roman nobles lived in their lordly mansions, amid hordes of slaves and freedmen gathered from every nation under heaven, and how meekly and ingloriously, on receiving a message from their Imperial master—it might be at the family dinner-table, or at an entertainment of friends, or perhaps in some distant province—they were content to die. They paint the vice, public and private, of that most vicious of capitals with all the realism, but without the coarseness, of Juvenal; they describe the great fire of Rome with a pen not less vivid, though more rapid, than that with which Defoe tells of the fire of London; they make the first mention in secular history of the name of Christ, and of His execution by Pontius Pilate; they describe the horrors of the first Christian persecution; while in the foreground of this varied drama there passes a succession of the most beautiful and the most wicked women that ever dominated a Court, or contaminated the springs of government.

Inter conjugum et liberorum lamenta, qui dum assident, dum deflent, saepe eodem rogo cremabuntur: this is a sentence which seems absurd as it stands, so Professor Ramsay thinks, but it is perfectly intelligible and shows no confusion of thought.

To readers, therefore, who are not much concerned with the Latin text, Professor Ramsay's version will prove delightfully interesting, and his footnotes scarcely less attractive. Both tempt a reviewer to linger too long over the history alone. One out of very many absorbing pages must be noticed, since it gives examples of two different kinds of merit conspicuous in the notes; their adaptation of Tacitus to the present time, and their emphasis on his dramatic effect. Concerning the economic condition of Rome in the year 51, Tacitus says: "It came out that there was not more than fifteen days' supply of food in the city. . . . And yet, great heavens! in the days of old Italy used to send supplies for the legions to distant provinces; nor is her soil unfruitful now. But we prefer to cultivate Africa and Egypt, and commit to ships and accidents the sustenance of the Roman people!" Whereupon Professor Ramsay remarks: "This page of history may be commended to the zealous Tariff Reformer of to-day"; and adds, "We import 80 per cent. of the wheat or flour consumed in these islands; and the Royal Commission on our food supplies reported in 1905 that in the month of August there is seldom more than five to six weeks' supply of bread-stuff in the country." Referring to the practice of fratricide common in the Parthian reigning house, Professor Ramsay quotes from Marco Venier this poignant sixteenth century analogy:

The new Sultan seems to be a resolute man and terrible. The moment he arrived at the Seraglio he went to look on his father's corpse; then his nineteen brothers were brought to him one by one. They say that the eldest, a most beautiful lad and of excellent parts, beloved by all, when he kissed the Sultan's hand, exclaimed, "My lord and brother, let not my days be ended thus in my tender age." The Sultan tore his beard with every sign of grief, but answered never a word. They were all strangled, all the nineteen. . . .

To tell Tacitus's own story of the splendid young ruffian Radamistus related in Book 12, Chapter 51, would be to spoil it, since it is too long to quote in Professor Ramsay's words. It recalls some scenes from the Arabian Nights, or one of the more dramatic episodes of Boccaccio.

It is inevitable that appreciation of Professor Ramsay's rendering as an interpretation of Tacitus's style cannot be so unqualified, for every admirer of Tacitus would render his words differently. Professor Ramsay's version is eminently attractive, without reference to the Latin. It accurately represents Tacitus's meaning when examined with the Latin. But as compared with the original it fails to interpret Tacitus's mind to the reader, as the Latin does in spite of all its difficulties. This is inevitable; Tacitus would not have the appellative power for which he is so famous, if his were readily translatable. All English versions must seem verbose, comparatively succinct as Professor Ramsay's is. But let anyone accept his challenge, and consider how he would translate the following passage:

Caesonio Paeto Petronio Turpiliano consilibus gravis clades in Britannia accepta: in qua neque A. Didius legatus, ut memoravi, nisi parta retinuerat, et successor Veranius modicis excursibus Siluras populus, quin ultra bellum proferret morte prohibitus est, magna, dum vixit, severitatis fama, supremis testamenti verbus ambitionis manifestus (14.29.1).

If we accept the challenge, thinking that we could render it better than Professor Ramsay has done (pages 205 and 206), as we shall no doubt all think in this and other difficult passages, let us reflect that he has kept up to a high standard throughout the whole of the Annals left to us, and though isolated passages or phrases might be better rendered by tours de force, a translator must be Tacitus himself bred in the writing of English, to be able to write so much at such an imaginary pitch. Professor Ramsay remarks, "When learning to write Latin prose at school, we used to be told to 'think in Latin.' In translating Tacitus, the converse operation must be performed, and we must 'think in English.'" He should mean a little more than he says in this Tacitean manner. The perfect translator of Tacitus must think in Latin and write in English, for until, impregnated with Greek and Latin thought, we have reduced our vague English thinking to precision, we cannot hope to be sufficiently unanimous with Tacitus, to express his mind in any language.

THE SIMPLE TURK

The Awakening of Turkey. By E. F. KNIGHT. (John Milne, 10s. 6d. net.)

It is just a year since we last reviewed a book by Mr. Knight, "Overseas Britain." His contributions to literature are always welcome, and in "The Awakening of Turkey" we find no exception. There are few men who have studied more closely the East, near and far, than has Mr. Knight, and in his three earlier works, "Albania and Montenegro," "Letters From the Sudan," and "Where Three Empires Meet," we have record of his experiences which have peculiarly fitted him to form a just judgment of the astounding events which have taken place in Turkey during the past twelve months. Through all his life of travel and adventure Mr. Knight has realised that the "best study for mankind is man," and thus we find in "The Awakening of Turkey" a very human document. We infer from page 282 that the title is an adaptation, that it is not quite original, though we would never accuse the author of the slightest plagiarism, for every page of this book would refute such an imputation. But in the autumn of last year, shortly before the first Turkish Parliament assembled, Mr. Knight witnessed in Pera a patriotic play given by a company of amateurs, all Young Turks, entitled "The Awakening of Turkey." The characters represented well-known men, creatures of the Palace, reformers, and others. The play opened with a prologue, "The Pasha's Dream." "The curtain rose and disclosed a room in which a white-bearded old man was sleeping in an armchair. He was recognised by the audience as a well-known victim of the Despotism. The Pasha, as he slept, dreamt a vivid dream, which now unfolded itself before us." And the dream which the Pasha dreamt might well have figured as the Prologue of Mr. Knight's book. The horrors of Despotism, its sensual joys while practising heartless cruelties, passed through its victim's sleeping brain, till he awoke and fled to Paris; on his death-bed, in exile, adjuring his only son to carry on the father's work of devotion to the freedom of his country. The play included a funeral oration over the remains of the dead patriot at the Mussulman burial ground, and we witnessed his apotheosis "when angels bore him upwards to Paradise." The final scene represented an entertainment at the Turkish Embassy, into which rushed a newsboy carrying a poster announcing the proclamation of the Turkish Constitution!

But perhaps Mr. Knight would consider this too dramatic a prologue. At no too great length we read the early history of the Turkish invasion, and the establishment of the great Ottoman Empire. Then the arrest of conquest, and the gradual dismemberment of that Empire, so that now, with the loss of Greece and all the Balkan States, as well as of those regions on the northern shores of the Black Sea (once a Turkish lake), Turkey "is left with but a narrow strip of territory stretching across the centre of the Balkan Peninsula from the Black Sea to the Adriatic." But, himself a lover of the Turk, Mr. Knight brings before us in strong contrast the true character of the Turk himself (and particularly of the rural Turk), when compared with the action of Turkish Despotism, of the Palace Camarilla, and system of espionage which has made the name of Turkish rule detested, above all during the reign of the late Sultan, Abdul Hamid, since 1878, when he abjured the Constitution which he promised to support. As we read these pages we are reminded of the old friendships of Englishmen and Turks of earlier days. British officers during the Crimean War made of their comrades in arms friendships which lasted sometimes for a lifetime. Merchants (who were most generally also sportsmen) who lived in Turkey held usually the opinion of the Turk which is quoted on page 6, as that of an eminent authority: "The men that I liked best among all that I met in the East were Turks. In some respects the Turk struck me as more like an Englishman, and more like a gentleman than any of the other races except the Magyars. He is a quiet, manly fellow, with great repose and charm of manner, and does not wear his heart on his sleeve. Europeans who live in the country look on the Turk as an honest man and a man of his word." It is an attractive character in every way. He is ferocious in war without doubt, but gentleness and humanity are among the most marked characteristics of the Turk. He is hospitable, temperate, devoid of meanness, and is a sincere friend. His kindness to animals is proverbial. On page 8 is a very generous tribute by a good English sportsman, "who knows the Turk as well as any Englishman can," to a robber friend of his, Redjib, now dead.

The political history of the country begins with Mahomed II. in 1808, and his successor, Abdul Mejid, who died in 1861, under whom the Hatti-Sherif of Gulhane was promulgated in 1839, which has been called the Magna Charta of Turkey, and again the Hatti Houmaïoum Firman in 1856, after the Crimean War, which announced the complete equality of the Christians and Mussulmans in Turkey. Abdul Aziz succeeded to the Throne in 1861, and began what seemed a most promising reign. He made the Turkish Navy, and organised that army which fought so splendidly at Plevna. But under ill advice, and influenced by Russian diplomacy, always opposed to progress, his policy became retrograde, and that final "struggle between the Palace and the Sublime Porte commenced which has resulted in the overthrow of Despotism." So in 1876 Abdul Aziz was forced to abdicate, after the publication of a notable Fetva by the Sheikh-ul-Islam (see page 31), who, in the name of the Mohamedan religion approved of the revolution in 1876. History repeated itself when again a Fetva was signed by the Sheikh-ul-Islam, and this time presented to the National Assembly when, on April 27 of this year, Abdul Hamid was deposed, but the approval of the Mohamedan religion was expressed in even stronger terms in this case (see page 351). The real story begins with the accession of Abdul Hamid in 1876, having sworn to uphold Constitutional government, which he repudiated in 1878. We have most forcibly brought to us the marvellous grip and power with which that wonderful man centred in himself all government, the absolute disposal of the armed forces of the country, and the direction of the finances. But we are brought face to face in this character with most astounding contrasts. Very able, a skilled diplomatist, and of indomitable will, his ruling impulse through life was fear. He feared any concession of liberal rights to his people because they would possibly be used first to control his own absolute authority, and so finally might make his own person less sacred. He feared even to maintain the Navy which Abdul Aziz had recreated, because in foreign ports liberal ideas might be instilled in his sailors, and thus his fear deprived him of a force which best of all could support his throne and the wealth of his country. He feared any assembly of men, and so social functions of the most simple and harmless kind were limited, for they could only be held with the approval of the police. And here Mr. Knight gives us pause, and shows that, owing to enforced seclusion and repatriation from social intercourse, the intelligent Turk became an assiduous reader and a deep thinker, and by the Sultan's own craven precautions the impulse grew for the liberation of Turkey from tyranny.

The Young Turk party were first heard of about forty years ago. They were a number of educated men who had fled to London and Paris when Abdul Aziz broke his promises and crushed the growing liberalism of Turkey. When Midhab Pasha, under Abdul Hamid, became a factor in the Government, their hopes revived, and many returned to Turkey; but when the Sultan, in 1878, dissolved Parliament and suspended the Constitution, they fled again and made Geneva their headquarters. Soon after the Central Committee was moved to Paris, and there the Ottoman Committee of Union and Progress was founded in 1901 under the direction of Ahmed Riza Bey. This Committee, which was to reform Turkey, was not taken seriously in Paris or London, and when Ahmed Riza Bey spoke at a meeting in London as late as 1904, he was by no means well received. The aim of the Young Turks was and is the Government of Turkey by Turks. They from all time were vowed to ensuring for all nationalities and creeds equal rights, absolute liberties. So when Ahmed Riza Bey spoke in London he "condemned European friends of Armenia and Macedonia for wrongfully and artificially inciting a rising, and so playing the part of the Pan-Slav agents, and he practically put it that by fomenting insurrection among the Christian populations in Turkey they were more or less responsible for the massacres which followed." The meeting appears to have become seriously agitated, and an influential humanitarian expressed the view that "the liberties of Christians would be just as unsafe under a Sultan with the sentiments of the gentleman who has just sat down as under the present Sultan." But, in spite of want of sympathy in the England of 1904, the Young Turks persevered, and when they succeeded they proved that influential humanitarian to be quite wrong and have won much sympathy and admiration from England.

In 1906 the Ottoman Committee of Union and Progress at Paris chose Macedonia as their headquarters. They felt that they were strong enough to carry the war into the enemy's country, and they chose Macedonia in consonance with their first principles. Macedonia was more or less in the hands of the international gendarmerie. The programme of England had been rejected, the programme which they recognised as unselfish. That of Russia and Austria (the Mürtteg Programme) was adopted and caused much offence, for a strong and united Turkish Macedonia was not well viewed in those States. So the Young Turks felt that their cause could best be served by smoothing over difficulties between Greeks, Bulgars and Turks. They won over the Army by slow degrees, and all the more enlightened of the Civil administration became members of their ranks. With the finished system of espionage of the Palace, it seems wonderful that the Committee should have been able to continue their work without destruction. But a secret system possessing a whole country makes men experts in secrecy. Initiation in the Young Turk association was conducted on the most approved principles of mysterious masonry, and after a year at Salonica the terrorists of the Palace became terrorised and the committee came to be feared by those whom they were working to upset. Among those who had joined the committee were many Hodjas, or religious teachers. The Army Corps at Adrianople and in Asia Minor were proselytised to Liberalism largely by the action of these Hodjas and by officers disguised as Hodjas, who were freely admitted to barracks in their capacity of preachers. So when a large force was ordered from Asia to overpower mutinous troops in Europe those Anatolian battalions were received as brothers and fellow revolutionists by their comrades of the Second Army Corps of Macedonia.

On the 3rd June, 1908, Major Niazi Bey raised the standard of revolt at Resna on the Albanian frontier. Enver Bey (late Military Attaché at Berlin) and others organised bands who won over the men of isolated garrisons and captured others. Their twenty days' wanderings on the hills, on the borders and in Albania read as a veritable romance. They lived ascetic lives, abjured all thought of self; they all took a vow to devote themselves alone to their country, and so in a few weeks every village was a "well-ordered centre of revolt," and all was ready for the final act when the Constitution was demanded on 23rd June and granted on the 24th. It was a triumph with very little bloodshed. Mr. Knight does not deny that men dangerous to the committee were killed, but each death was an execution, not a murder. And certainly Niazi Bey showed great discretion and knowledge of human nature in ordering in one village "The execution of a particularly obnoxious tax-gatherer . . . and the man's rams were divided among the members of the band, who were thus enabled to enjoy a luxurious meal."

We have all read in the Press how all Turkey fraternised and rejoiced together on the grant of the Constitution. But they are simple-hearted people, and, having been granted freedom, they thought, of course, they could do just what they liked, and it resulted in much obstruction of traffic and in many humorous incidents which Mr. Knight describes admirably. There was comparatively little license, and the only dangerous incident was the coal strike, which was suppressed by the promptitude and courage of two young officers. The General Election of last October found a people who did not know the value of a vote, and who in many cases feared to register their names in case doing so might entail some new tax. The election in Constantinople produces some picturesque writing on page 300 and following pages.

We are given the whole electoral system and the qualifications for franchise, and for membership of the Assembly. One election law is quoted which commands our whole-hearted admiration: "By Article 72 of the Constitution the penalty for influencing elections by false statements and calumnies is a fine of forty pounds and a period of imprisonment of from one year up to five years according to the gravity of the offence." Happy Turkey! Would that England were equally happy. The posters about Chinese labour at the last election would have materially reduced the enormous majority of the present Government, for it is not yet five years since the calumnies were printed, painted and uttered.

The temporary success of reaction and the final triumph of constitutionalism have due attention, and we are shown conclusively that the energy and power of organisation of the Committee of Union and Progress are undiminished. We come to the end of this most attractive book all too soon. It brings us up to the events of to-day almost. But it does more: it fills us with hope that this great-hearted people may now rule themselves in peace and prosperity, ensuring to the many races that are combined under the national term Ottoman the freedom and happiness which has been won by such long years of patient labour.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Fancy O'Brien. By ELLA MACMAHON. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

THE simple elements of so many deplorable tragedies—the wronged woman, the man promised to another—are used in this short but powerful story with telling effect. Francis O'Brien, the "Fancy" of the title, is a crude, uneducated young Irishman, whose tastes lie in the direction of lurid clothing and swaggering behaviour; Bridget, or Bridge, the girl whose love for him is so disastrous, is a pathetic, trustful little drudge in a "general" shop. The reader can hardly help wondering what poor little Bridge could have seen in the unspeakable Francis so to cleave to him, but, undoubtedly, such things do happen. Juliana Corcoran, a wealthy publican's daughter, is also fond of Francis, and these two become engaged, for the lad has wasted his substance and is in need of money. His despicable treatment of the other girl, who would have died for him, leaves the reader with little sympathy for his tragic end; all the sadness seems to be for little Bridge in her hour of trouble, with perhaps a trace of pity for the blowsy, overdressed Juliana, whose wedding-ring will never be used. Not much of the leaven of humour enters into this story, and in the nature of things it can hardly avoid being sombre; but it is excellently told, and contains some realistic studies of lower-class life in the Irish capital.

The Gay Paradines. By MRS. STEPHEN BATSON. (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.)

THE early years of the nineteenth century, with their queer poor-laws, their occasional wife-sales, and their curious country customs, offer a profitable field for any enterprising writer who can construct a good story, and Mrs. Stephen Batson has utilised them with conspicuous taste and ability. Few recent novels, we fancy, have so successfully conveyed the atmosphere of a definite period without lapsing into occasional aridity; in this book the history of the young Paradines, two scions of a county family, is related with an energy and a humour which forbid the faintest suspicion of failing interest. The theme most prominent among the vicissitudes of Charles and William Paradine is their search for a lost relative, a girl whose sorrowful story is woven with the events recounted in a manner which permits the reader to learn the secret; there is little mystery, but one criticism which suggests itself is that the circumstances of Nan's disappearance might with advantage have been expounded more clearly in the opening chapter. Nan, persecuted by the attentions of various men, is a charming character altogether, rarely cast down for long even when things seem at their darkest. Her marriage with a gross farmer—almost an alliance of brute with angel—and the unexpected proximity of William, her former lover, as an inmate of the same house, precipitate matters, and she is saved from a cruel fate—that of being sold to any amorous bidder—only at the very last moment. Charles and William for years had been searching for their little relative, but Nan herself, who was, unknowingly, their object, had changed her surname to that of the woman who had adopted her, so that even before her marriage the quest was fruitless. The ending is somewhat abrupt and unsatisfying after the clever working towards a climax of the previous chapters; but to conclude on a note of complaint when the book has given us so much pleasure would be ungrateful, so with the small reservations mentioned we can heartily recommend the story to all our readers; the standard is high, and the tone good in every way.

Sixpenny Pieces. By A. NEIL LYONS. (John Lane, 6s.)

THIS is rather a heart-aching book to read, not by reason of any shortcomings on the part of the author, but because of its subject-matter. The scenes centre round the dispensary of a doctor in the East End of London (the usual fee for treatment being sixpence), and, while humour abounds in the various characters which step in to have their say, it is generally tainted with the grim, poverty-stricken atmosphere of the slums; the laughter is choked with a sigh; it is all so hopeless. Yet the little doctor's cheery, profane, sarcastic remarks and dissertations are at times very apt and very mirth-provoking, while the study of "James," his daughter and loyal assistant, is capital. A young artist, Mr. Baffin, who occupies a room in the same house, seems to be introduced rather superfluously to lengthen the book; he is not particularly amusing, nor is he convincing.

Apart from the dialogue, and the occasional dramatic incidents which Mr. Lyons recounts, there are two or three fine passages which show the author in a vein which we could well wish him to pursue more frequently, such as, for instance, this little interlude of description:

The April sun had come out sharp to time, and was winking fitfully upon all of us, like the unsettled, rakish fellow that he is. And a girl with two great baskets full of wondering daffodils had come out, too; and some conscienceless vagabond was extracting melody from a cornet. So that even the Regent's Canal, with its sombre vicinage and sulky craft, seemed, as if by some surprising effort, to have taken on an air of sweetness and youth and hope. As one looked down upon the face of these waters, so strangely heartened by the sunlight, a sort of certainty grew upon him that they would suddenly break into perspective; that their vista would cease to be obscured by coal wharves and cranes and hoardings; that somebody's whisky, commended to your notice in large white letters on a blue-enamelled background, would fade and fade and fade, until it merged with the white clouds and the blue sky behind it. Then need you but sigh and sit back, beholding a silver streak set snugly between hills, and flowing, flowing, flowing to the edge of the world. Instead of which . . . Pooh! There was no instead. The April sun kept winking at the daffodils, and the daffodils kept staring at the sun, and the cornet-man made music by the waterside. So that even a poet might have smiled at it all. For here, I'll swear, was none of your mere "waterways" created by syndicates for profit; here was none of your world-capitals. Just a little old river, sunning itself gratefully in a little old town that God had made.

The conclusion of this chapter from which we have quoted is tragedy of the deepest and saddest, and the constant repetition of this mood makes the whole book a depressing one, in spite of its cleverness of observation and its excellent sketches of character. As a glimpse of a corner of London life which has not often been exploited, it bears every indication of reality and avoidance of exaggeration, and comes under the heading of good work in literary style and the handling of unpromising material.

A Family Influence. By W. H. WILLIAMSON. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THE position of Ida Venn, the central figure of this capital novel, reminds us very much of the dilemma of Rose Jocelyn in "Evan Harrington." Rose was desired in marriage by young men in high places, but loved the son of a tailor, "the great Mel"; with Ida, "the heir to a baronetcy asked her to marry him, and she hesitated; the son of a chemist talked to her and she was thrilled." The son of a chemist, however, was a fellow of sterling qualities and abounding intellect, and, it must be admitted, not such an irritating person as Evan Harrington often shows himself; he forges ahead in the career of a barrister and seems in the way of making his fortune, so he wins the heart of this lady fair in spite of the amiable and somewhat clumsy wooing of young "Del" Gillan-Wells, heir to a title and an impoverished estate. The sketch of the little circle of people whose bosoms are flurried by this course of true love is very cleverly done; the dialogue is most happy, humorous with no straining after brilliance, and sarcastic at times with a pungency quite amusing. A love affair almost equal in importance is that of Del's brother, who, refusing to enter the Church, becomes partner in an enterprising motor business; he also succeeds, and well deserves to do so. The girl of his choice, Miss Templa Bellams, is quite irresistible, an inconsequent, ambitious little creature always with an eye to the main chance—even in the letter to her mother, which announces the clandestine marriage, she does not forget to emphasise the advantages of her husband's motors:

We are going to Brighton for our honeymoon; we are going there so as to motor it. I hope you are well. Please don't worry about me. I am very, very happy. At any rate you can't be upset since I have married somebody you know. . . . And if you hear of anybody who wants to buy a motor don't let them buy any kind except a Templa, made by Shufflebottom and Co. They are the best on the market. They go better than any other make, and don't send out nasty noises like most of the others. But I'll enclose a prospectus with this, and you can read it up and then get people to buy them. I should think Dante would allow you a commission if you'd sell a few cars.

The author has a pretty knack of comment, as exemplified in the following sentences:

"Ha, ha, ha, ha!" The laughter was forced, inadequate, bloodless and hollow, but it was expressed and so deserves a place in this history. In its way, too, it may strike a keynote and be of great psychological value. A laugh is a personal matter, and the laugh can be identified with the "vacant mind," the humorist, the man who not only sees a joke but enjoys it, and not merely enjoys it but revels in it, etc. The distinctions are limitless. But a hollow "Ha, ha, ha, ha!" in a minor key! Surely laughter missed its footing there. And yet the noise was distinct; it was not melodramatic. There was no big-hatted, big-moustachioed villain to thunder it out and stamp supremely at the same moment. They who laughed so were ladies.

This personal interlude, however, is rarely used, and the story goes on straightly and clearly from the very first page. We have found the book very entertaining, and, in places, brilliant.

Inns of Court. Painted by GORDON HOME. Described by CECIL HEADLAM. (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE fascination of old-time London is an influence which few can avoid when straying from the beaten tracks, the noisy, populous thoroughfares. All about the city, even in these days of despoliation and reconstruction, little islands of antiquity remain in the sea of modern brick and stone. Saint Bartholomew's Church, Smithfield, with its wonderful tiny graveyard; the "Little Wonder," not far away, curiously lonely amid huge, straight walls; the old houses in Fetter Lane and Neville Court, weatherbeaten and shot with faint colours; and many other unexpected survivals, greet the exploring stranger. Most interesting of all, perhaps, in the antiquity of its origin, is the group of buildings which we know under the name of the "Inns," and of these historic halls and squares the author of this volume discourses in a manner which cannot fail to charm the reader, although some disagreement with an occasional dogmatic statement is possible. To dismiss his book as one in the category of mere "colour"-publications would be to do it an injustice; its text is far more important than its illustrations. So much of history is bound up in these places, so many famous names are recalled by them, that it was a praiseworthy task to jot down with some method a compact survey of their inception and their careers.

Law-students, congregating together for mutual convenience in the Hostels, or Inns, of Court, formed the nucleus of the present powerful association whose headquarters are so familiar—exteriorly, at any rate—to Londoners of the later days. As early as 1344 apprentices of the law were housed "near Fleet Street, at Clifford's Inn," and Thavie's Inn was leased from one John Thavie, "a worthy citizen and armourer," who died in 1348; these seem to be the two first-mentioned gathering-places for ambitious lawyers-in-embryo. "In such hostels," says Mr. Headlam, "voluntary associations or guilds of teachers and learners of the law would congregate, and gradually evolve their own regulations and customs." By the middle of the fourteenth century these colleges—for the training was on a system closely allied to that of Oxford and Cambridge—were well established, clustering about the boundaries of the City from Holborn to Chancery Lane, and from Fleet Street to the river. Customs differed then from those that now prevail. Revels and dancing to the accompaniment of music were frequent diversions of the gentlemen of the Inner Bar, and All-Hallows, Candlemas, and Ascension Day were celebrated with the utmost festivity. "On Christmas Day, Service in the Church ended, the gentlemen presently repair into the Hall, to breakfast with Brawn, Mustard and Malmsey," says an old chronicler. Masques and plays were also in great favour, and Queen Elizabeth in her time is supposed to have patronised many of these gatherings. Dealing first with the Temple, Mr. Headlam traces the origin of the Knights Templars, and relates how the fine round church which lies hidden behind the traffic of Fleet Street derived its shape from the holy places of Jerusalem. About the middle of the twelfth century they are said to have been established in Chancery Lane, and their property embraced part of the site of what is now Lincoln's Inn:

But it was not long before they moved to a pleasanter site, to the "most elegant spot in the Metropolis," as Charles Lamb declared. For, about the year 1180, the Templars acquired a large meadow sloping down to the broad River Thames, on the south side of Fleet Street, and stretching from Whitefriars on the east to Essex Street on the west. Here they built themselves a lordly dwelling-place and a splendid church, again a round church upon the same sacred model, part of which still stands. Across the way lay their recreation ground.

This recreation ground, then known as Fitchett's Field, was the site of the modern Law Courts, that gloomy, Gothic pile which dominates the neighbourhood. From then the roll of names inseparable from the Temple and the Inns is a long and honourable one. Here was the Royal Treasury of King John. Henry III. endowed the Temple with manors and privileges. Dr. John Hooker was one of the Masters of the Temple, and Canon Ainger's name will occur to many as another famous Master of our own times. Thomas Day, the eccentric author of "Sandford and Merton," lived in chambers here; Goldsmith, Johnson, Fielding, often walked the gardens; here "Eliä" was born, and Blackstone wrote his "Commentaries." At Lincoln's Inn John Donne was a student. "Canning, Perceval, Disraeli, Gladstone, O'Connell, William Penn, and William Prynne stand out among the makers of history who have been members of this Inn, while among men of letters, the George Colmans (father and son), Horace Walpole, Charles Kingsley, and George Wither are the most prominent." It is difficult for us to realise to-day that Great Turnstile and Little Turnstile were narrow lanes leading to actual fields, while Gray's Inn was on the borders of the open country.

We must not pursue the reminiscences any farther in a brief review; suffice it to say, in conclusion, that the book is one which all students of ancient London should read, and which will assist many a casual explorer to appreciate the beauties of the old buildings that lie so near to the heart of the city. The illustrations are good, but not in any way remarkable.

COLLINS'S "ODE TO EVENING"

IN a letter to John Newton of March 19th, 1784, Cowper writes: "I have lately finished eight volumes of Johnson's Prefaces, or Lives of the Poets. In all that number I observe but one man—a poet of no great fame—of whom I did not know that he existed till I found him there, whose mind seems to have had the slightest tincture of religion; and he was hardly in his senses. His name was Collins." This was written five and twenty years after the death of the poet who had produced some of the greatest odes in the language, and yet in all that time one of his most distinguished contemporaries had never heard of him. When he did learn that Collins had lived and written, Cowper was misled regarding his poetical achievements through the inadequate criticism proffered by the biographer. Johnson gives a delicate and affecting memoir of the man whom he had known and liked, but he was as incapable of understanding the poet and his methods as he was of grasping the intuitional theory regarding the subjectivity of matter. The majority of the literary magnates of the time were with him, and Collins was depreciated by Dodsley, the eminent publisher, in comparison with Joseph Warton. These two poets, it would appear, had agreed to issue a common volume of odes, but presumably the arrangement was disturbed by the publisher, who gave Warton's lyrics to the world and left the friend to find another and an inferior outlet for his unfashionable wares. Collins's subsequent history is that of a man indifferent and sadly unstrung. He was yet to write his worthy tribute to the memory of Thomson, his exquisitely melodious "Dirge in Cymbeline," and his dexterously varied, comprehensive, and sonorous "Ode on the Popular Superstitions of the Highlands of Scotland," but he practically closed his literary career with the "Odes on Several Descriptive and Allegoric Subjects," issued in 1746 from the house of A. Millar in the Strand. Curiously enough, he was not altogether excluded from the great Dodsley's portals. In 1746 he contributed to the publisher's "Museum" his "Ode to a Lady on the Death of Col. Charles Ross," and two years later he is represented in "Dodsley's Collection" by this poem and the magnificent "Ode to Evening," each including important variations on the original text. One of the glories of our literary accomplishment, the latter triumph of descriptive fancy is very properly included in the late Mr. Palgrave's "Golden Treasury." As in that popular anthology it will have hundreds of readers for one who will see it in a complete edition of the poet's works, it is of importance to see how it has fared at the compiler's hands.

In its first form the "Ode to Evening" is very beautiful—revealing in its choice of characteristic features its appropriately suggestive imagery, and the melodious fall of its movement the poet's intimate grasp and appreciation of his theme—and had this remained without alteration the lyric would have held an indisputably high place among the great achievements in English verse. It so happens, however, that in the separate publication of the poem by Dodsley, two years after the author had given it an integral place in his little volume, there are certain variations too important to be overlooked. These, there can be no reason to doubt, are due to the poet himself. There is no evidence on the point; we can only infer that for some reason Collins granted the use of his sovereign lyric for the projected miscellany, and re-touched it here and there in his desire to compose a symmetrical unity with an aspect of graceful comeliness. He then gave his ode the final shape in which he wished it to appear, nor did he alter it again, but left it thus as the finished product of his artistic skill. Against such a decision there should be no appeal, for an author's emendations, especially when all are improvements, as in this case, should invariably command consideration and respect. While fully illustrated in the practice of the poet's most worthy editors, this loyal demeanour, as we shall see, is not characteristic of the late Mr. Palgrave.

In his original version Collins thus opens his address to the mythical personage into whose serene presence he moves with votive fervour:

If aught of oaten stop, or pastoral song,
May hope, O pensive eve, to soothe thine ear,
Like thy own brawling springs,
Thy springs and dying gales.

In his revision he presents what Mr. Swinburne justifiably calls "the exquisite recast of the originally exquisite second line," the touch in the third rendering it also worthy to sustain its enhanced relationship. Johnson blames Collins for indulging in "clusters of consonants," and had he specialised he might have taken a relevant exception to the hardness of effect produced by the juxtaposition of two syllables at the very heart of the second line in this its primary form. The poet himself had perceived the existence of the undesirable collision, and he removes it effectually by this felicitous resetting:

May hope, chaste eve, to soothe thy modest ear,
Like thy own solemn springs.

As thus presented these two lines, in their new strength and cadence, surely reach perfection as nearly as possible both in imagery and in sweet and melodious phrasing. Verbal changes in the third and ninth stanzas are important and significant, evincing as they do the supreme artist striving after the utmost purity and grace of metrical expression. An alteration of the sixth stanza illustrates the same quality in happy and effective exercise, for it conjoins new plausibility of deliverance with the original play of refined and aspiring fancy. In his first delineation the poet described elves as those "who slept in buds the day," but on second thoughts he apparently realised that even these tiny entities required some accommodation for their time of repose, and so he substituted "flowers" for "buds" when he brought the lyric to its perfect and final blossom. The eighth stanza is so completely recast as to be practically new. In the author's volume it stood thus:

Then let me rove some wild and heathy scene,
Or find some ruin, 'midst its dreary dells,
Whose walls more awful nod
By thy religious gleams.

This is the greatly improved reading in "Dodsley's Collection":

Then lead, calm votaress, where some sheety lake
Cheers the lone heath, or some time-hallowed pile,
Or up-land fallows grey
Reflect its last cool gleam.

The rapturous vision with which the poem concludes is again variously altered throughout, and in every case for the better. It read in this wise in the earlier version:

So long, regardless of thy quiet rule,
Shall fancy, friendship, science, smiling peace,
Thy gentlest influence own,
And love thy favourite name!

The bright and satisfactory rifacimento is as follows:

So long, sure-found beneath the sylvan shed,
Shall fancy, friendship, science, rose-lipp'd health,
Thy gentlest influence own,
And hymn thy favourite name!

When everything conspires to show that the poet worked minutely on his lyric in order to bring it as nearly as possible to his conception of full and final beauty of form, it would surely be no more than fair for every editor to respect his preferences or to show reason for personal dissent. It might, of course, be possible to aver that the original text is undoubtedly the author's, while the second has only hypothetical and undisputed claims to that privilege, or alternatively it is open to a critic to deprecate the emendations, and to contend that the earlier is the better version of the two. In the "Golden Treasury," however, Mr. Palgrave takes an independent position, and gives not the slightest hint as to any peculiarity that may be discovered in his treatment of the text. In the original preface to his excellent and stimulating anthology, he expressed the belief that inter alia the work would prove "a source of animation to friends when they meet." This it may possibly be in a sense which the anthologist did not contemplate, for in various instances it may give occasion for sharp disputes over the character of his editing. He ought, most assuredly, to have respected the decisions of his authors, presenting them as they presumably wished to appear to readers for whom one, and only one, version of a lyric was to become familiar. In giving the "Ode to Evening" Mr. Palgrave uses the original text as it stands in Collins's volume, with the one exception of superseding its "brawling springs" by the "solemn springs" of "Dodsley's Collection." Having done so, he at once provokes the question, Why give this and nothing more? If he believed that one alteration came from the poet's hand, then why did he not recognise the others as having equal authority? He ignores the "exquisite recast" of the second line and all the other well-considered and felicitous variations, admitting into his version only what seemed to be worthy of his editorial imprimatur. So far as can be seen, he had no ground for assuming that the one change he adopted was genuine and all the others spurious, and he is therefore without justification in the exercise of his eclectic method. If he considered that Collins must be credited with one of the emendations for which Dodsley is sponsor and accepted it, he must have had some cogent reason for rejecting the others. Either he knew, which is extremely problematical, that they were not authoritative, or he thought them unsatisfactory. One is sorry to be forced to a conclusion derogatory to the critical judgment of an editor whose tact, sense of propriety, and fine discrimination have all been widely recognised and honoured, but in this particular case there seems, unfortunately, to be no alternative. All that remains to be said is that admirers of great poetry must go elsewhere than to the "Golden Treasury" if they would see the "Ode to Evening" as the author left it in the full perfection of its exquisite loveliness.

QUOIT

THE N.E.D. considers that the variants suggest a F. origin. These are coyte, coite, c(h)oytte, coylt, coight; quatte, quayte, queit, quait. The word is used both of "quoting" and "curling." The N.E.D. quotes (1890) "coiting, kuting, or quoting was for a long time in common use to describe the game (curling), and in some districts is still applied to it." See also Jamieson, s.v. coit. So that to the N.E.D. forms may be added S. quyte (Jamieson) and quite, quyte, quyte (Jamieson, Supplement). Hone, describing "curling" (1827), says: "The stones are called coits or quoits or coiting or quoiting stones" (N.E.D.). The earliest record in the N.E.D. is (1388): "Les jeues appelez coytes dyces," etc. The Prompt. Parv. has "coyter, petreludus"; "coyte, petreluda"; "coytyn, petreludo." Palsgrave has both the noun and the verb. The modern game of "quoits" is probably only a special development of various games in which flat stones were thrown (as in quoits) or pushed (as in curling) with the object of getting as near as possible to a mark, as in bowls.* It is possible that Gargantua's boulle plate (Rabelais, I., 22) means something of the same kind. I do not believe that the word is of F. origin, for among more than two hundred games enumerated by Rabelais there is no word that can possibly be connected with quoit. The regular F. name for the most nearly corresponding game is palet (Palsgrave), diminutive of "pale, pelle, shovel." There is an older term "bricoteau, palet de pierre" (D.G.), which Palsgrave renders "coyte of stone." So also Cotgrave, who describes it as an old word. Assuming that the S. forms in u and i represent the older word and that E. and S. quoit is due to some undiscovered influence (cf. recoil from reculer), I should identify the whole group with E.S. cute (Jamieson), quytt (Jamieson, Supplement), "a cute, doit; a small Danish coin worth about one-twelfth of a penny," used by Dunbar, Lyndsay, etc., and derived (Jamieson, Supplement) from O.Dan., "kvitt, one-third of a Danish shilling." There are two games which may be regarded as miniatures of "curling" and "quoiting" respectively — viz., "shove-halfpenny" (formerly "shove-groat"), in which coins are pushed along a table to a given mark; and "pitch and toss," in which they are thrown at a mark in the ground. Now, Holyoak gives "discus, a quoit or penny-stone," and Shakespeare's use of the verb "to quoit" (2 Henry IV., ii., 4): "Quoit† him down, Bardolph, like a shove-groat shilling," also suggests a connection with something like the game of "shove-halfpenny." Cramer (1712) and Veneroni (1714) both render palet by Plapperstein. Grimm describes this as "ducks and drakes," and connects it with the verb "plappern, to babble," but Cramer says expressly "jetter le palet, pour mettre au plus près d'un but," etc., so that the first component may very well be the coin plaphart, plappart, plappert, which Grimm regards as of the same origin as F. blafard and explains as Weisspfennig. Thus Plapperstein does correspond to Holyoak's penny-stone (v.s.). Cramer also gives, s.v. Plapperstein, "jouer à la merelle," which was originally a game of the "shove-halfpenny" class, and now resembles "hop-scotch" (see Cotgrave, merelle, and D.G. marelle, méreau). For palet Veneroni also gives It. piastrella, which appears to be still in use. Torriano has "piastrellare, to quoit, to play at quoits." In short, the various games played with a disc of stone or metal, of which quoits is only one development, take their names, like all other games, from the implements used. From the fact that in the earliest quotations in the N.E.D. "quoits" are coupled with "dice," it seems possible that the out-door game is the later. The general identification of the quoit with the discus (in the seventeenth-century dictionaries) is wrong, as throwing the discus was rather a test of strength. Cooper (1573) does not use quoit in defining "discus, a rounde thing of stone, leade, or yron, having an hole in the middes, which men used to throw up into the ayre for exercise or game." Cf. also Prompt. Parv.

E. W.

* "Playing at coytes or nine hooles" (New Custom, 1573).

† Not "throw," but send him sliding down, cf. "and away slid I my man like a shovel-board shilling" (Middleton and Dekker, The Roaring Girl, 1611).

It is not always wise to herald the advent of the midsummer month with a flourish of metaphorical trumpets, or to babble too early of green fields and flower-lined hedgerows, lest June be cruel and give from her store but five or six sunny days in which to venture forth. Sadly are Englishmen and Englishwomen at the mercy of a wet day and a low temperature, taking them at an average; only here and there will a brave spirit rise superior to drizzle and cloud, forcing the body to tramp defiantly and joyously through the rain and wind, to gain thereby health and a free mind. Most of us cultivate the art of sitting gracefully at the fireside and wishing for fine weather. Not many poets have been enraptured with the summer rain, but it has found apologists in prose on several notable occasions; best of all, perhaps, from George Meredith, the apostle of the outdoor life in England. We cannot refrain from quoting that magnificent defence of a drenching day from the "Egoist"—a passage which thrills the reader whether he find it for the first or the twentieth time:

Rain was universal; a thick robe of it swept from hill to hill; thunder rumbled remote, and between the ruffled roars the downpour pressed on the land with a great noise of eager gobbling, much like that of the swine's trough freshly filled, as though a vast assembly of the hungrier had seated themselves clamorously and fallen to on meats and drinks in a silence, save of the chaps. A rapid walker poetically and humorously minded gathers multitudes of images on his way. And rain, the heaviest you can meet, is a lively companion when the resolute pacer scorns discomfort of wet clothes and squealing boots. South-western rain-clouds, too, are never long sullen; they enfold and will have the earth in a good strong glut of the kissing overflow; then, as a hawk with feathers on his beak of the bird in his claw lifts head, they rise and take veiled feature in long climbing watery lines; at any moment they may break the veil and show soft upper cloud, show sun on it, show sky, green near the verge they spring from, of the green of grass in early dawn; or, along a travelling sweep that rolls asunder overhead, heaven's laughter of purest blue among titanic white shoulders; it may mean fair smiling for awhile, or be the lightest interlude; but the watery lines, and the drifting, the chasing, the upsoaring, all in a shadowy fingering of form, and the animation of the leaves of the trees pointing them on, the bending of the tree-tops, the snapping of the branches, and the hurrahings of the stubborn hedge at wrestle with the flaws, yielding but a leaf at most, and that on a fling, make a glory of contest and wildness without the aid of colour to inflame the man who is at home in them from old association on road, heath, and mountain. Let him be drenched, his heart will sing. And thou, trim Cockney, that jeerest, consider thyself, to whom it may occur to be out in such a scene, and with what steps of a nervous dancing-master it would be thine to play the hunted rat of the elements, for the preservation of the one imagined dry spot about thee, somewhere on thy luckless person! The taking of rain and sun alike befits men of our climate, and he who would have the secret of a strengthening intoxication must court the clouds of the south-west with a lover's blood.

In spite of all this, rain in June is unwelcome, as we have had opportunity to prove this month. Thoughts are turning irresistibly holiday-ward; we know that fields are yellow with buttercups, pink with clover, fragrant with scents of flower-life in its prime, and the craving grips us to be out among it all, to behold something more open and less civilised than a park, something more inspiring than the stony vistas of the city. June calls; a midsummer madness is upon us; we are weak to resist. "A pleasant noise" is in the air:

A noise like of a hidden brook
In the leafy month of June,
That to the sleeping woods all night
Singeth a quiet tune.

From the beginning of June until mid-July the night is but "a deliberate wink of the eye of light." The pale, triangular wing of radiance slowly wheels round the north, to unfold when reinforced by the rising sun, and on any hill, given a clear atmosphere, the vision of that mingling of sunset with dawn is a memorable one. Still more beautiful is it to watch the sea-line change from deepest indigo to faint pearly gleams, flushed with crimson as the midnight recedes; nothing imparts so curiously a sense of the rotundity of the earth, its poise in space, as these summer dawns seen from some lofty cliff above the sea. It is as though we swung up from out the sunset towards the zenith, and dropped down into the sunrise-glow; the great stars and planets pale their fires, and the moon becomes a silver mask, a mere decoration for the vault of heaven. Only in June can this slow movement of the world be apprehended so perfectly.

For many ages the worship of the sun lingered in curious customs and festivals held on Midsummer Eve, especially in the country districts. In Cornwall promenaders used to carry lighted torches from village to village, perhaps a reminiscence of Druidical rites, and in Ireland as late as 1782 fires were lit "in honour of the sun," with accompaniments of solemn dances. Chester, Nottingham, and other towns had their peculiar methods of keeping up this festival, usually including some kind of masque and morris-dance. In Somersetshire, on the Saturday before Old Midsummer Day, allotments were chosen by means of apples marked with the number of corresponding pieces of land. At the present day the delightful old ceremony of "cheese-rolling" takes place at Cooper's Hill, near Gloucester, on Whit-Monday—generally in June—so a brief description may not be out of order. On the summit of the hill, a steep spur of the Cotswolds, covered with turf and surrounded by lovely woods, are booths and shows and all the paraphernalia of a country fair—albeit quite orderly. At a certain hour of the afternoon the younger folk line up on each side, from the bottom of the hill to half-way up, and small round cheeses are rolled from the top. They fly down at tremendous speed, glancing from inequalities in the ground, often bursting in many fragments over the roofs of two or three little cottages which are clustered below. The boy who captures one is entitled, we believe, to a small reward. On a fine, sunny day it is one of the quaintest sights imaginable, and the affair is given "tone" by the presence of the clergyman and well-known people of the district.

Midsummer Eve used to be celebrated in London by the lighting of bonfires, and in olden times a procession of the "watch" passed through the principal streets, "To wit," says Stow, "from the little conduit by Paul's gate, through West Cheape, by the Stocks, through Cornhill, by Leadenhall to Aldgate, then backe down Fen-church Street, by Grasse-church, about Grasse-church conduit, and up Grasse-church Street into Cornhill, and through it into West Cheape again." This procession was an extensive—and expensive—affair; some thousands took part in it; constables carried cressets, with attendants: "Every cresset had two men, one to bear or hold it, another to beare a bag with light, and to serve it"; while "divers pageants" also contributed to the humours of the day and night. On St. John's Eve, in 1510, King Henry VIII. came "to the King's-head, in Cheap, in the livery of a yeoman of the guard, with a halbert on his shoulder, and there, in that disguise, beheld the watch till it had passed, and was so gratified with the show that on St. Peter's night next following he and the Queen came royally riding to the sayd place, and there, with their nobles, beheld the watch of the city, and returned in the morning."

One of the most interesting anniversaries that occurs during this month is that of the stone-laying of "New" London Bridge. This took place on Wednesday, June 15th, 1825. Hone, the chronicler of the time, to whom we are indebted for so many pleasant comments, was present at the ceremony, and apparently bought a copy of each of the next morning's journals (not so formidable a matter as it would be now), in order that he might present his readers with a satisfactory account of the affair. Spectators gathered in thousands, of course—some few witnessed it from the top of the Monument—and the river was crowded with boats and barges bearing awnings until it resembled a country fair. The band of the Horse Guards escorted the procession of civic notabilities from the Guildhall, up Cornhill, and down Gracechurch Street to the scene of operations:

The Lord Mayor took his station by the side of the stone, attended by four gentlemen of the Committee, bearing, one, the glasscut bottle to contain the coins of the present reign; another, an English inscription incrusting in glass; another, the mallet, and another, the level.

The Sub-Chairman of the Committee, bearing the golden trowel, took his station by the side of the stone opposite the Lord Mayor.

The Engineer, John Rennie, Esq., took his place on another side of the stone, and exhibited to the Lord Mayor the plans and drawings of the bridge.

The members of the Committee of Management presented to the Lord Mayor the cut glass bottle which was intended to contain the several coins.

After a speech or two the mayor spread the mortar, and the stone was safely lowered to position; the sword and mace were laid upon it crosswise; the band played the National Anthem, and "three cheers were given for the Duke of York, three for Old England, and three for the architect, Mr. Rennie." In the inevitable English manner, everything concluded with a dinner at the Mansion House. The bridge was urgently needed, not only for the growing traffic, for ancient engravings show the river rushing through the arches of the older fabric with the force of a mill-race.

To-day, in this June of eighty-four years after, we cross that same bridge—widened, it is true—and can but imagine what Hone's surprise would be could he watch the roaring stream of vehicles which now pours ceaselessly across his beloved Thames!

AN AUTHOR'S POST BAG

I.

DEAR SIR,—We note in a recent issue of a morning journal an article from your pen. While fully recognising its merits as a whole, we cannot help being struck by the fact that it displays certain deficiencies of style and a general lack of descriptive power. We are confident, however, that this could be remedied if you would take up a course of instruction (by correspondence if necessary) as imparted by our unique system of literary tuition. A moderate inclusive fee, and complete proficiency guaranteed after six lessons (for leader-writing two additional lessons are recommended). One of our clients has just had a letter to the editor printed in the Times (Biddlecombe, N. Devon), and several others are on the high road to similar distinction. We enclose terms, and also explanatory pamphlet giving full details of system. By the way, with reference to the matter of style we have alluded to, you should note that prepositions must not be used to end sentences with.

Yours faithfully,

AUGUSTUS BUNN, Ph.d. (U.S.A.),
L.C.C. (Literary Correspondence Corporation).

How long is it since "with" has ceased to be a preposition?

II.

MY DEAR SIR,—I am told that you have just contributed a thoughtful article on "Taming Ghosts" to the current number of the Rag-Bag. As I am extremely interested in psychical research I should regard it as a great favour if you would kindly send me full particulars as to the result of your experiments in this direction. What I am specially anxious to know is (1) sex of ghost recommended for the purpose; (2) language spoken by same; and (3) possibilities of photographing the apparitions. Any information you may be able to accord me on this subject will be looked upon as strictly confidential.

Yours very truly,

J. SIMON GULLIBLE (REV.),
Mudborough-on-the-Marsh.

The article dealt with goats; not ghosts.

III.

SIR,—Will you permit us to draw your kind attention to the fact that, in accordance with your request, we recently forwarded you on appro. one of our new "Non-Splash" fountain pens. We should be glad to learn if the same has given entire satisfaction? If you could favour us with a few suitable lines directing notice to its merits we should be pleased to incorporate same in a little handbook we are bringing out for business purposes on "How Famous Authors Work."

We are, dear Sir, yours faithfully,
THE "NON-SPLASH" FOUNTAIN PEN CO., LTD.

Reply:

I am quite unable to write with your pen. I lost it a month ago.

IV.

SIR,—I am in receipt of your ungentlemanly communication, in which you have the impertinence to demand payment of one guinea for the wretched little article I honoured by copying out of a vulgar English magazine and printing in the Belfast Blade five or six years ago. As you were sent two copies of the paper at the time your rubbish appeared in it, I have no intention of making a grasping Saxon like yourself any further honorarium whatever. Nor am I to be intimidated by your brutal threats of taking legal proceedings. The next letter you write on this subject will be treated with silent contempt, and I shall answer it in a way you won't like.

Yours, etc., TERENCE SHAUGHNESSY O'ROURKE,
Editor, Belfast Blade.

DEAR SIR,—In this age of motoring it has, no doubt, often struck you that every author should have his own automobile. An idea, however, commonly prevails that this is an expensive luxury, and, as such, is beyond the means of those who do not enjoy the advantages of serial publication in the Sunday papers. We beg to state, however, that by availing yourself of our new and improved system a car can be supplied on highly favourable terms. All that we require is a preliminary deposit of £1,800, and seventy-five weekly instalments of £20, together with banker's reference and the names of two responsible householders as sureties. On making the last payment, the car (famous "Dashaway" pattern) will be delivered to yourself or legal heirs.

Faithfully yours,

WILLIAM SMITH,
Director, Authors' Automobile Association, Ltd.

Reply:

Please send particulars of higher-priced cars.

VI.

DEAR SIR,—As a prominent literary gentleman, you will doubtless appreciate the vast and growing importance of having your name kept conspicuously before the public. This desirable object can best be achieved by placing yourself in the hands of our Press Publicity Department, which is conducted by a well-known journalist and ex-editor of R.O.T. ("Really On Top") the famous society paper. For a fixed fee (which may be paid by instalments) we send out ten paragraphs every day relating to your movements in the social world, etc. Our clients embrace many gentlemen, as well as authors. Hoping to hear from you in due course,

We are, dear Sir, yours truly,

DEAR SIR,—I have just seen in the correspondence column of this week's Flail a letter signed "Paterfamilias" about your new novel, "The Aims of Coralie." I consider it perfectly horrid, and most unfair, and I shall write to the editor and tell him so. All my friends agree with me in thinking that the statement by "Paterfamilias" that "this deplorable work should not be permitted in a respectable home" is nothing less than libellous. Of course, everybody here is ordering it at once from the nearest bookshop.

Sincerely yours,

GERTIE PRINGLE,

DEAR SIR,—I am instructed by my Committee to ask if you will be good enough to take the chair at a Social Evening (morning dress) of the Balls Pond Athenæum next Friday week, 8 p.m. The subject for debate on this occasion will be "The Press as a Power," and you will be expected to address a mixed audience, included among whom will be several of our leading Suffragettes in the district.

DEAR SIR,—I have derived so much interest from reading your clever and charming articles in the Scrap-Heap that I should esteem it a great favour if I might do your typewriting for you. As I am only a beginner, I am not yet very expert, and take rather a long time to finish any work. I live quite in the country, but the nearest post-office is only fifteen miles away, and we could send for your letters twice a week. You could therefore rely on anything you wanted in a hurry being done in a fortnight or so. With regard to terms, I should be pleased in your case to reduce my ordinary charge to as low as three shillings and sixpence per 1,000 words. Hoping this will suit, ESTEEMED SIR,—It has occurred to us that there may be times (as is so often the case with distinguished literary gents in this age of hurry and turmoil) when you feel exhausted by your journalistic labours. We therefore beg to point out that any ill effects resulting from such employment may be completely dissipated by means of our invaluable specific "Braino." As a brain-builder for weary writers this has done wonders, in even the most obstinate and stubborn cases imaginable. We can see no reason, therefore, why you should not also benefit by it. A prominent author (fiction) has just telegraphed, "'Braino' has increased my circulation considerably, as well as improving my general health." This marvellous remedy is prepared from a strictly scientific formula, invented at enormous expense, and after many years' patient research among the Obbbibbaway Tribes in Central South America, and elsewhere. The principal ingredients consist of rare drugs and roots known only to our own analysts, and their existence has accordingly never been heard of by medical men. "Braino" is positively guaranteed to cure that tired feeling, lassitude, emptiness before meals, and pronounced disinclination for hard work, etc., so characteristic of our leading novelists nowadays. We enclose price list, and also a ten-page pamphlet of testimonials, written by a number of leading specialists.

We are, dear Sir, very cordially yours,

CORRESPONDENCE

THE IMPERIAL PRESS BANQUET.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—As THE ACADEMY must be read by many British journalists of the unimported brand, or of the sort not engaged in advertisement canvassing, medicine selling, or shopkeeping, perhaps you will feel warranted in publishing some of the following bits of information that have reached me concerning the recent Imperial Press Banquet:—

Some of the colonial guests appeared to imagine that Lord Burnham, Mr. Moberly Bell, Mr. Alfred Mond, Mr. H. H. Marks, and about 25 per cent. of the other British journalists at the banquet were present as representatives of London's Semitic colony.

The visitors also seemed to imagine that Messrs. Pomeroy Burton, Alfred Bukes, Robert Porter, and various other employees of the Harmsworth newspapers, were present at the dinner as representatives of our large American colony.

Lord Rosebery's failure to make any reference in his speech to the valuable services of the great Baron Northcliffe in building up the flourishing colony of American journalists in London was the subject of much unfavourable comment among the banqueters.

The absence, too, of any mention in Lord Rosebery's speech of the inestimable services rendered by the Taily Noos, the Vestminster, and the Morgen Leater, in opposing legislation likely to retard the growth of the foreign colonies at Wormwood Scrubs, Colney Hatch, and Dartmoor was also condemned.

A considerable proportion of the banqueters appeared dissatisfied because the food provided was not Kosher, and the bill of fare not printed in Yiddish.

Messrs. Captain Coe and Old Joe, who occupied seats at the same table as Brummagem Parke, J.P., of the Morning Leader, and Ulster Jim, of the Star, appeared to be surprised when the waiters refused to accept their tips.

The American and Jewish banqueters are said to have banqueted with their usual audibleness, but the report that one of them accidentally swallowed his knife is without foundation.

The presence of Baron Northcliffe and Sir George Newnes at the dinner reminds one that it was Sir George's Tit-Bits which published the first article the Baron ever clipped.

The statement that Mr. Mark Cohen, of the Dunedin Evening Star, and Mr. Lewis Ashenheim, of the Jamaica Gleaner, have been engaged by Lord Northcliffe to edit The Times is, of course, untrue, as neither of these gentlemen has been in the employ of Mr. Hearst's New York Journal or Mr. Pulitzer's New York World.

The envy, hatred and malice which a certain class of men entertain towards those whom they regard as business competitors was made evident by the refusal of the proprietor and advertiser of Bung's Insomnia Cure to sit at the same table as Mr. Loe St. Strachey and Mr. St. Clement Shorter.

The many banqueters who were not Britons seemed to be Britain's.

Much surprise was expressed among the banqueters at the absence of any newspaper representative of the German pauper colony of Hertfordshire.

Among the other Pressmen at the banquet was Mr. Gordon Selfridge, who, presumably, represented the clothes press.

It was foolish of the colonial visitors to imagine that Mr. Alfred Mond, of the Westminster, was present as a representative of the German colonies. The population of the German colonies being simian in character, rather than Semitic, they would have been more suitably represented by a gorilla rather than a Jew.

Many of the "Pressmen" seen at the banquet are engaged in advertising free gold watches, electric belts, elixirs of life, etc., in the Metropolitan newspapers. The glances of withering contempt which these "schentlemen" darted at the editor of Truth's Cautionary List must have made that person heartily ashamed of himself.

As a member of the colony in London which resents any interference with the monopoly it has acquired of the local chestnut-vending business, it is, perhaps, fortunate that Mr. Chiozza. Money was not placed at the same table as Mr. Owen Seaman.

JOSEPH BANISTER.

BURNS'S POEMS FOR GERMAN STUDENTS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The supremely superior air as a "literary critic" assumed by your anonymous correspondent, "Scrutator," may make it seem presumptuous to remind him that, after all, the late Mr. W. E. Henley had some repute in that line, and that the main gravamen of his charge against me is that I am saying ditto to Mr. Henley. It may be useless for me as regards "Scrutator"—though not, I hope, as regards the majority of your readers—to affirm that Mr. Henley was a most ardent admirer of Burns; that, next to Byron, he was his favourite poet among the moderns. I can also assure him, and them, that Mr. Henley was more than surprised at the accusation that he was endeavouring to depreciate Burns; he was of opinion that by the course of study he was following in editing Burns he was acquiring a fuller and more intelligent comprehension of him; and it was his hope that he might be the means of increasing the intelligent appreciation of the great Scottish poet in England as well as Scotland. What right has your anonymous correspondent to attribute bad motives either to him or me in the matter? What right has he to say that I am doing what in me lies to bring Burns down from his pride of place? Why, on earth, should either Mr. Henley or I have had a spite of Burns? Again, what is Burns's "pride of place"? Or do you bring him down from it when you seek to distinguish between his strong and his weak points, and between what he wrote and what he merely altered or amended? "Scrutator" is greatly concerned lest I should be assisting the wicked Germans in depreciating English men of letters! What a curious nightmare! If he knew much about educated Germans he would be quite cured of his apprehensions. They are enthusiastic students of English literature, and some German writers have done a good deal to elucidate the relations of Burns to his poetic predecessors.

I must protest against the assumption of "Scrutator" that I am depreciating Burns in asserting that he was specifically a peasant poet; that on "account of his peasantry" Burns as "a poet of Nature" has "a place of his own." The utterly inexcusable character of the superior "Scrutator's" misrepresentation will be sufficiently manifest from the following quotation from my introduction: "His uniqueness consists in this—that he was a man of essentially rustic tastes and experiences, dealing with rustic themes largely in his own rustic language, and in metrical forms specially suited to that language, but dealing with them in such a manner as to win for him a place among the classic poets of all time." May I also submit that the literary "Scrutator"—not I—is depreciating Burns when he supposes that "a nobleman with a gun on his shoulder"—how the gun would help him I do not quite see—could have written such lines as "the blackening trains of crows to their repose," "ye curlews calling thro' a clud," "deep-toned plovers grey, wild-whistling o'er the hill," etc., etc., or that "winter hurdling thro' the air the roaring blast" might, so far as the merit of the lines are concerned, have been found in verses to the Lass of Ballochmyle, supposing she had replied poetically to the Bard? Or is that what "Scrutator" means? The captious remarks on the glossary may almost be left to speak for themselves. The glossary is succinct. My aim was simply to give the nearest English equivalent. The "wail" of "Scrutator" about "be" as equivalent to "alone" implies that the book is intended for Germans who are ignorant of English! "The German aspirant to English knowledge," so writes the sapient "Scrutator." Also, he even takes for granted that I am explaining it not as a Scots but as an English word! For why else should he be guilty of quoting Hamlet's "To be, or not to be," and the Ancient Mariner's pathetic "Alone on a wide, wide sea," in order to make fun of my lamentable stupidity? However presumptuous it may be in me to differ on a literary point from "Scrutator," I venture confidently to affirm that Matthew Arnold, Shakespeare, and Coleridge were English, not Scots, poets, and that the sentences he quotes from them contain only English words. I quite agree that "churl" is not the exact equivalent of "sumph," but it is its nearest English equivalent. But my one unpardonable fault it would seem is the assertion that "cheep" means "to peep." "Mr. Henderson," writes "Scrutator," "may not know that nestlings are often called 'cheepers' by the adventurous boy who raids the spring hedges, otherwise he would have recognised that 'cheep,' which is a variant of chirp, has rare phonetic excellence." Whether in my youth I enjoyed the privilege of raiding the hedges with the adventurous "Scrutator" I, of course, cannot tell. I may or may not know the remarkable fact that the wicked boys called the poor things "cheepers," but I know that young birds are called "peepers" in English, and I also know that "peep" means to cry distressfully as well as to chirp.

NOTES ON SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Collier years ago made the remark: "Shakespeare always best illustrates himself." Since nowhere in "Othello" is Desdemona represented as repentant of her treatment of her father, the passage:

How have I been behav'd, that he might stick
The small'st opinion on my least misuse, does not at all evidently convey the meaning assigned to it by Mr. Dey in his valuable communication to THE ACADEMY, May 29th, p. 161. In keeping with Desdemona's previous question, "Alas! what ignorant sin have I committed?" the true interpretation would seem to be: "What can I have unwittingly done to cause him to put the worst possible construction on my pettiest misdemeanour?"

In the sentence from "King Lear," "All cruels else subscrib'd," the last word may be taken to have its exact original significance, and therefore to be simply equivalent to "written beneath us of inferior rank—i.e., negligible by comparison."

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I have read Mr. Cuninghame's communication on "wondrous strange snow" in the current issue of THE ACADEMY with interest, and, though I am not convinced that "flaming" should be substituted for "strange," I think that there is much to be said for the conjecture—even more than is urged by Mr. Cuninghame.

The New Shakespeare Society apparently never acted upon Tennyson's suggestion of a tabulation of probable cases of literal confusion arising from the old style of handwriting prevalent in Shakespeare's day, possibly because it was thought to be the province of critics to instruct poets, and therefore beneath the dignity of the former to take a hint from the latter. There can be no doubt, however, that the consideration of the ductus literarum is, at times, a most valuable aid in solving textual difficulties. In the present instance such consideration strongly reinforces the conjecture in question.

For we have only to remember that "m" was often in the old handwriting indicated by a mark above the preceding letter to recognise the obvious similarity in appearance of "fl" and "sl" (the "s" being the long non-final form of that letter), and to realise the possible addition of "e" after "g" to see how easily "flaminge" might be read as "strange."

With regard to the conjecture, however, there may be something in the objection that so far as "flaming snow" was a known phenomenon, as Mr. Cuninghame seems to infer from his quotations from Hakluyt, Shakespeare's language, if he wrote "flaminge," will lose in expected force. It was partly due to this consideration that I some time ago advocated reading "strong," which, as written, might have been taken for "strang"—a possible form for the word "strange."

THOMAS CARLYLE: PROPOSED NATIONAL MEMORIAL.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—At the recent opening of the Annan Academy in Dumfriesshire, by Sir James Crichton Browne, F.R.S., he alluded to the absence of any national memorial to Thomas Carlyle in the land of his birth and the home of his early life and work.

Prompted by his remarks, I have, in co-operation with Sir James, undertaken to initiate a movement which I trust may meet with success, and remove too long delayed steps to perpetuate the memory of our great national philosopher in some fitting manner to be hereafter decided upon.

I shall be glad to hear from anyone interested in the matter, and who will allow his name to be added to a Committee to be formed to carry out the project.

C. D. O. Barrie, Esq., 39 Moffat Road, Dumfries, N.B., has kindly undertaken to act as Interim Secretary, and all communications may be addressed to him.

ABBOT FRANCIS GASQUET and "PUBLIC OPINION"

The Abbot Francis Gasquet, the eminent Roman Catholic scholar and historian, Abbot-President of the English Benedictines, who is now engaged at Rome on the most interesting task of revising the Vulgate, sends the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, dated Feb. 15, 1909, from Collegio Sant' Anselmo, Monte Aventino, Rome :—

Sir,—I see that many are expressing their opinions about your paper, and as I have for a long time now got so much pleasure and profit from it, I feel constrained to add my testimony to that of others. Obligated to be away from England for many months each year on business, and with little time to spend on the reading of papers, I have found PUBLIC OPINION exactly what I needed to keep in touch with passing events, and I look forward to the coming of the post which brings it to me.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
agd. (Abbot) FRANCIS H. GASQUET.

LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS'S SONNETS AND THE "TIMES"

It is usual for publishers to make considerable play with "first reviews," particularly when they happen to be favourable reviews. The Academy Publishing Company published on Thursday last a book of SONNETS by LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS, and with that great enterprise which so distinguishes it the "TIMES" of Thursday apportioned to the book its first review. Here it is in letters of gold :

"These [meaning the Sonnets] are marked by accomplishment in the sonnet form."

Of such noble and generous praise author and publishers alike may well be proud. The "Times" has spoken the truth, and the ACADEMY PUBLISHING CO. ventures to believe that the public which cares for verse will consequently hasten to purchase through their booksellers what is left of the first edition of the SONNETS. The price is still 2/6 net, though the encomiums of the "Times" might well have justified an increase.

PRICE THREEPENCE

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

"... He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible bitter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chaloner believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Nor are we disappointed. Mr. Chaloner goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Hornschoke.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern:—

A fecund sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedeizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly bags and matrons fair!
His vooreses doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chaloner steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, ROANOKE RAPIDS, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spangl'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak:
Beklames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse,
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a four de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chaloner to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-flaving. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 6th, 1908.

LIFE AND LETTERS

WE are glad to see our old friend the Saturday Review taking a proper line about the Imperial Press Conference. Last week it printed an admirable article on this subject, under the heading of "Bunkum in Excelsis." In striking contrast are the utterances of Mr. St. Loe Strachey's paper, the Spectator. We quote the beginning of an article from that dangerous and dismal journal. It is called "Lord Rosebery and the Press Conference."

Lord Rosebery may always be trusted to rise to a great Imperial occasion. He possesses to a degree not vouchsafed to other public men that inestimable art which enables a man not merely to think the right thing on the right occasion, but to say it, and to say it in words with which tact, good feeling, good humour, and good sense are equally blended. The Imperial Press Conference constitutes a great occasion, for here are gathered in the old home representatives of an institution of which the British race is peculiarly proud.

It is astonishing that sane people can be found in England literally in thousands to read this sort of canting fudge. The truth of the matter is, of course, that Lord Rosebery is an accomplished after-dinner speaker, and that out of politeness to the guests of the Imperial Press Conference he went through the necessary hoops with his usual agility and urbanity. One of these hoops was a highly held one and a difficult one to negotiate—the hoop of taking the proceedings seriously. Lord Rosebery went through it like a bird; but that does not alter the fact that the whole of the proceedings of this precious Conference amounted to an ignominious farce. As to the institution of which the "British race" is peculiarly proud (in other words the Harmsworth-cum-Pearson-cum-Newnes - cum - Cadbury - cum-Rowntree-cum-Strachey press), all we can say is that if the "British race" cannot find something more worth being proud about it had better go out and drown itself in a body. The present condition of the Press in England is quite horrible. Corruption, dishonesty, cant, humbug and religion for gain are what chiefly characterise it. The "British race," so far from being proud of it, is beginning to have serious qualms about it, and if Mr. Strachey fails to understand this so much the worse for him. Mr. Strachey may take it from us that the "British race" is not proud either of him or the Spectator; and while the "British race" is on the whole, and not without reason, well disposed to Lord Rosebery, it would have thought a great deal more of him if he had given the assembled pressmen a little wholesome plain speaking and serious criticism.

Mr. Strachey is very strong on the "broad-minded tolerance" racket in religion; and Mr. Stead, if we remember rightly, made an effort some years ago to throw a very wide net in the religious way. In Mr. Stead's case the scheme took the form of sending an amiable Nonconformist minister to Rome, with a view of roping the Pope and the Cardinals and the Holy See generally into a concern beautifully and brightly denominated the "Union of the Churches." Needless to say, Rome received the proposals with inextinguishable laughter, and the whole project came to an untimely end. But a certain scion of a noble house, who in the intervals of exercising his feudal propensities is not above turning a nimble penny, has apparently come to the conclusion that in Mr. Stead's exploded scheme there may possibly yet be money; consequently, it appears that we are threatened with the appearance of a new paper, entitled, if we mistake not, the Re-Union Magazine. The bright young gentleman in question is connected with two publishing firms, which carry on two very different classes of business; for while one firm in which he is the principal shareholder is engaged in publishing religious works and translations of various Christian liturgies, the other has gone in chiefly for dubious stories of a highly spiced character and anything else that will bring grist to the mill without actually compelling the intervention of the police. It will be interesting to observe whether the beautiful Christian spirit which is expected to pervade the columns of the Re-Union Magazine will enter into this gentleman's business affairs to the extent of bringing about a union between Messrs. Dash and Co. and Messrs. Blank and Blank, the two firms in question. We withhold their names for the present, but we shall revert to this matter on a future occasion, and as it is one of obvious public importance and highly interesting from the point of view of letters, we shall leave nothing unsaid.

What Mr. Israel Zangwill would no doubt describe as a controversy between himself and Lord Curzon of Kedleston has been going on in the columns of the Standard. As a matter of fact, it has been much less of a controversy than a free advertisement for Mr. Zangwill which Lord Curzon and the Editor of the Standard were very unwise to give him. Gentlemen of the political eminence of Lord Curzon have no business to engage in controversies in the newspapers with third-rate novelists, especially on the question of Woman's Suffrage. Mr. Zangwill has made the important discovery that Lord Cromer, Lord Milner and Lord Curzon, who have all three of them occupied the positions of what the hapenny papers describe as "great pro-consuls," are all strenuously opposed to Woman's Suffrage. Naturally Mr. Zangwill is not surprised; no supporter of Woman's Suffrage ever is surprised at anything. "Ha, ha," says he, "we have here three eminent public characters all opposed to Woman's Suffrage, and on looking into the matter a little closely we find that they are all branded with the common stigma of having served their country in the most exalted positions in India, in South Africa, and in Egypt. What can one expect from such people?" If they had been minor novelists of the Jewish persuasion it would have been another matter. The general public, however, will not be disposed to accept Mr. Zangwill's view as to the relative weight of distinguished statesmen and undistinguished writers.

The misfortune of the Woman's Suffrage movement is that it has never been able to claim as a supporter even one single man who is intellectually distinguished in the broad sense. Their pride and their glory is Mr. Bernard Shaw, and we wish them joy of him. Any cause supported by Mr. Bernard Shaw and Mr. Israel Zangwill, to say nothing of Lord Russell and "Dr." Clifford, is foredoomed to ignominious failure; and even the roars of Mr. Frank Harris in his best rabbit-skin coat will avail the Suffragists nothing. They are played out.

Mr. Frank Harris, in Vanity Fair, expresses himself as follows:—"We are very sorry indeed that Mr. Justice Darling comes into our black list this week." Mr. Justice Darling, on the other hand, will probably be consumed with joy, especially as the offence which has induced Mr. Harris to include him in his "black list" is that of sentencing to a month's imprisonment a disreputable scoundrel of the name of Harry Boulter. The man Boulter was charged some months ago with using indecent and blasphemous language in a public place, and thereby causing pain and disgust to thousands of people. He was charged before Mr. Justice Phillimore, who, on his giving a solemn undertaking not to repeat his offence, allowed him to go free on his own recognisances. Boulter deliberately broke his promise and violated his undertaking, and he was accordingly re-arrested and brought before Mr. Justice Darling, who very properly sentenced him to one month's imprisonment. Mr. Harris asks with a great show of indignation "Who is responsible for these disgraceful prosecutions?" As Mr. Harris is anxious to know who is responsible for these prosecutions we have pleasure in informing him that the police are responsible for them, and if Mr. Harris is anxious to add a month or two in gaol to his variegated experiences he has only to go out and imitate the example of his dear friend Mr. Boulter. Mr. Harris goes on to describe Boulter's opinions as "opinions which are almost universally held by educated people to-day." It was Mr. Harris who the other day informed the polite world that Mr. Lloyd George's Budget had been received on every side with acclamation; so that Mr. Harris evidently mistakes the opinion of his own limited circle for the opinion of the country at large. This is a serious blunder from the point of view of mere journalism. If Mr. Harris is impelled, whether by choice or by necessity, to frequent the society of ladies and gentlemen who approve of blasphemy and delight in the Budget proposals of Mr. Lloyd George that is his own affair; but he really must not assume that such people represent the feeling of the community at large, whether they choose to call themselves "educated" or not.

The Church Pageant, which took place last week, was more or less ruined by a continual downpour of rain; in fact, the elements of heaven, not to say the stars in their courses, fought against it for all they were worth. Our first feelings when we heard of this catastrophe were those of sorrow and commiseration, but subsequently we happened to pick up an illustrated paper containing a portrait of Mr. Chesterton dressed up as Dr. Johnson, and it appears that Mr. Chesterton, so caparisoned, took a prominent part in the Church Pageant. No wonder the elements of heaven and the stars in their courses were outraged and expressed their disapproval in the comparatively mild form of floods of rain. Under the circumstances we should not have been surprised to hear that an earthquake had swallowed up the whole Pageant. Needless to say, Mr. Chesterton no more resembles Dr. Johnson than Mr. Pawling resembles Dr. W. G. Grace.

There is no accounting for the vagaries of the public taste. Not many months ago Mr. Lewis Waller produced an admirable drama called "The Chief of Staff." Of its kind it was one of the best plays we have seen for a long time, and, while it was frankly melodramatic, it had, in addition to several thrilling situations, a distinct literary touch about the dialogue. For some extraordinary reason the play was almost universally damned by the critics, and was taken off after a run extending to only a few days. At the present time Mr. Waller is producing what is quite evidently destined to be a great popular success, "Fires of Fate," by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. For our part, we make no complaint; for we are always pleased to see so conscientious and sterling an actor as Mr. Waller meeting with due rewards. On the other hand, candour compels us to say that we have seldom witnessed a more clumsily constructed play than "Fires of Fate" or listened to a duller or more wooden dialogue. The idea of the play is quite a good one—that of a man, apparently in full health and strength, suddenly informed by his doctor that certain symptoms, which he had taken to be merely passing manifestations of some ephemeral complaint, are in reality indications of an absolutely deadly and practically incurable disease, leaving their victim not more than a year or eighteen months at the outside to live. To do Sir Arthur Conan Doyle justice, we must say that in the first act he rose well to the situation, and we had begun to think that we were going to witness a good piece of work; but the remaining acts completely went to pieces. Some idea of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's conception of the way to import reality into a piece of dramatic work may be gathered from the fact that of the chief persons in his play (a very tiresome middle-class company of Cook's tourists on a Nile boat) one is a Scotsman, with dialect; another is an Irishman, similarly afflicted; another is a Frenchman, who talks the usual Frenchman's stage English; and two others—the heroine of the piece and her aunt—are Americans! However, all this did not prevent Mr. Waller from giving a fine performance in the part of Colonel Egerton, and the whole company made the best of their opportunities. We shall not particularise, except to note an accomplished piece of acting by Mr. Evelyn Beerbohm in the part of a rich young Cockney bouncer, whose "better feelings" come out under the stress of misfortune, and to express our regret that Miss Auriol Lee, an exceedingly beautiful woman, had somehow or other managed to make herself look almost plain by putting on two of the ugliest dresses we have ever had the misfortune to gaze upon. We cannot help thinking that these dresses must have been chosen by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle himself, possibly with the assistance of Mr. Pawling, of the "house of Heinemann."

On the day of publication last Thursday week a "review" of Lord Alfred Douglas's "Sonnets" appeared in the Times. It consisted of exactly nine words, and it seemed to us to be such a complete example of what a review ought not to be that we wrote up a full-page advertisement round it, and printed it for two weeks running on the outside back cover of THE ACADEMY. The Times, of course, would have been perfectly justified in ignoring the book of "Sonnets" sent to it for review; but we maintain that any paper which reviews a book at all is bound to do so seriously and honestly. We were not in the least chagrined by the foolish and undignified ineptitude of the method adopted by the Times for "getting back a little bit of its own" in revenge for the scathing criticism of its conduct which we have felt it our duty to put before our readers on several occasions during the last two years. Anyone who has read THE ACADEMY at all carefully must be aware that our opinion of the Times under its present management is not an exalted one, and we should have imagined that it would have been impossible in the whole of London to find anyone so utterly lost to all sense of humour or appreciation of irony as to misunderstand the purport of the full-page advertisement of the "Sonnets" which appeared in the last two numbers of THE ACADEMY. But we have reckoned without Mr. Bottomley, or, as in view of all the circumstances, we shall take the liberty of naming him in future, Mr. Bolmondely. It appears that Mr. Bolmondely took the advertisement quite seriously and really imagined that the author and the publishers of the "Sonnets" were beside themselves with joy at receiving a one-line notice in the Times; and he has been regaling his readers with what he no doubt considers cutting paragraphs based on this childish assumption. Poor Mr. Bolmondely, in his desperate attempts to score a point against THE ACADEMY, has come a series of the most undignified croppers that have ever visited a professional company promoter, who is endeavouring to pose as a journalist; while, as for Vivian, the rejected of Constantinople, ever since we had occasion to reprove him for his dastardly attack on the honour and reputation of Lord Roberts, his features have become a map of woe, and his cheerful laughter is no longer heard in his favourite resort, the ground floor of the Café Royal, where, like the village blacksmith, he sits among "the boys."

In Saturday's Westminster Gazette there appeared what purported to be a review of Lord Alfred Douglas's "Sonnets." On Tuesday the following letter was addressed to the Westminster Gazette:

HIGH POETRY.

The Editor, THE WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a review of Lord Alfred Douglas's "Sonnets" which was printed in the Westminster Gazette on Saturday last. Your reviewer begins his notice with a quotation from a note of my own, which quotation I shall ask your permission to repeat:

Leaving out Shakespeare, who is a sonneteer to himself, Milton gave us a few good sonnets; Keats has given us a similar few; and the same holds true of Wordsworth, of Matthew Arnold, of Rossetti, and of Swinburne. To this general few—probably not a hundred all told—a good number of the sonnets in the present book must be added. Several of them will stand on their pure merits so long as the English language is understood.

These are my words. In the course of his lengthy remarks your reviewer pretends to controvert what I have said; but he is careful never flatly to say that he does not agree with me, preferring rather to do his work by innuendo. If I am unjust to him perhaps he will be so good as to assert in your columns that the opinion which both of us have now quoted cannot be justified out of the "Sonnets." At a moment when the question of the proper recognition of poetry by reviewers is being so widely discussed it seems to me highly desirable that spurious critical coin, whether it be mine or your reviewer's, should be nailed to the counter.

Yours truly,

T. W. H. CROSLAND.

June 15th, 1909.

As the editor of the Westminster Gazette has not printed this letter, we are forced to the conclusion that he has been unable to communicate with his contributor. It would have been courteous of Mr. Spender to advise us that this was the case. However, we will give him till next Tuesday to print Mr. Crosland's letter, or, in default, to offer some explanation to his readers. The matter is far too serious from the point of view of criticism to be allowed idly to pass.

SONNET.

CALL the musicians hither; bid them play;
For evening comes all ruthfully and needs
Deft clavicern, the fiddle-men, and they
That finger up and down their diverse reeds,
Pipes, flutes, and horns: and where is one who leads These gentles on their quaint, harmonious way?
'Silence: and then the gracious viol pleads
From speaking strings; and the rest have their say.

Set forth, ye marching melodies austere;
Lest we remember wanton Youth gone winging,
Charm us away to Arcady's green glades,—
Where down the beechen solitudes we hear
Calm voices lifted in some golden singing
That we would have with us when music fades.

CERBERUS IN THE HOUSE

THE House of Commons, under the baneful influence of the present Government, is rapidly becoming the abiding place of every kind of unseemliness. On Tuesday last one of the Labour Members, a Mr. W. Thorne, surpassed all previous records. "Mr. W. Thorne (Labour, South West Ham) asked the Foreign Secretary if he was aware that the Emperor of Russia intends to visit English territorial waters at about the latter end of July, and if the visit will in any way be officially recognised by the Government?" Having received a suitable reply, Mr. Thorne proceeded further to say: "Is the right hon. gentleman aware of the intense and growing feeling of the country against the visit of the Emperor of Russia? It would be a very good job if the Russian people—" at this point Mr. Thorne was interrupted by the Speaker; but a few moments later he again interjected the words: "I hope he (the Russian Emperor) will get his deserts when he comes here. The British don't want him." Major Anstruther-Gray called the attention of the Speaker to this observation, and the Speaker somewhat tamely said: "It is a rather discourteous expression to make towards the monarch of a friendly foreign power." Whereupon Mr. Thorne said "He is an inhuman brute," and there, amidst loud cries of "Order!" the incident came to an end. We consider that it should not have been allowed to end in this way. That any ill-bred working man who happens to get himself elected to the House of Commons should be allowed with impunity to make insolent remarks about the sovereigns of friendly powers is a disgrace and a scandal. The man Thorne should have been called upon to withdraw his disgraceful language; and if he refused to do this he should have been suspended and turned out of the House. It is bad enough that for our sins and follies we should have to endure the presence among our legislators of persons who would more properly be engaged in selling vegetables from a coster's cart or attending to the plumbing, but at least we might expect that they should keep civil tongues in their heads. We do not for a moment wish to say anything against costermongers or plumbers. On the contrary, we like them and respect them in their proper places; but these places do not include the House of Commons. We have no knowledge of the particular form of "labour" which was honoured by the distinguished attention of Mr. Thorne before he took to politics as a profession; nor do we wish to suggest that Mr. Thorne was ever either a costermonger or a plumber. We have far too much respect for costermongers and plumbers to suggest anything of the kind; but we shall take the opportunity of saying quite plainly that Mr. Thorne has demonstrated once for all his utter unfitness to represent any class of working men. Working men in the lump are neither foul-mouthed, abusive, nor impudent; and they have, as a rule, a proper respect for things and persons which ought to be respected. Consequently, when they are represented in Parliament by men who think it a fine thing to indulge in ignorant and vulgar abuse of their betters they are, in fact, being misrepresented in the most serious way possible. We shall not waste the time of our readers by arguing out the question of the personal character of His Imperial Majesty the Russian Emperor. Those who have any knowledge of him are aware that His Majesty is the kindest, the most generous and the most humane of men. His position—that of a man in daily and hourly danger of violent death at the hands of bloody-minded and unscrupulous ruffians—is one which must command the sympathy and the respect of every decent man and woman in the world; and that he should be subjected to unprovoked insults at the hands of persons like Mr. Thorne is nothing less than outrageous. Of course, Mr. Thorne in his present attitude has in his mind's eye the shining example of the great Mr. John Burns. Owing to the unfortunate and deplorable action of the late Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in making a Cabinet Minister of Mr. Burns, the horny-handed sons of toil who have achieved three hundred a year and a seat in the House of Commons have got the idea firmly implanted in their breasts that the royal road to honour and advancement is virulent language and violent defiance of authority. Unfortunately, what is done cannot be undone. The sop has been given to Cerberus, and Cerberus, after the manner of his kind, has devoured it and is asking for more. In point of fact, what Cerberus ought to get is not sops, but a big thick stick, not applied unnecessarily or cruelly, but always kept in reserve in case he deserves it.

PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENTS

FROM AN AUTHOR'S POINT OF VIEW.

A FEATURE common to practically every publisher's agreement is one stipulating that "all details connected with advertising the said book shall be left to the publisher's discretion." After the book has appeared and the advertising of it is completed, the author will probably think very little of the publisher's "discretion." It is quite likely, indeed, that he will be disinclined to credit him with any, and in doing so he will not, generally speaking, be far wrong.

Authors and publishers disagree on many points, but it is over this matter of advertising that they are more often and to a greater extent at loggerheads than over any other one connected with the production of books. The publisher complains that the author makes impossible demands upon him, and the author, for his part, feels convinced that the publisher is committing literary infanticide and that his offspring is deliberately strangled at birth. Hence the entente that should exist between the two often becomes a little strained.

When a writer finds that his masterpiece has fallen flat he naturally blames the publisher. As often as not, he is quite justified in doing so, for when the average publisher brings out a book he seems to take quite extraordinary pains to prevent the fact becoming known. This may be very dignified, but it is not the way to sell books. Certainly no other tradesman would be fatuous enough to think that whatever he deals in will automatically find a market without any effort on his part. The truth is books are the most difficult of all classes of goods to sell, and therefore require both energy and enterprise to put them into circulation. But this appears to be persistently withheld.

The average sum spent on advertising an ordinary book is probably about £20. This is little enough, in all conscience; still, provided the money be intelligently applied, it is enough to secure the book a fair amount of publicity. In nine cases out of ten, however, the money is not intelligently applied. It is simply wasted. First of all, the advertisements in themselves are wrong, and, secondly, they appear in the wrong channels. Unless an advertisement whets the appetite, as it were, and induces the reader to buy the article to which it refers, its appointed mission is not served. Now, to make any sort of appeal to the reader is about the last result achieved by the average book advertisement. What it does is merely to frighten him away. This is because it is so unattractively worded that it looks as though it had been composed by the office-boy. At any rate, it only stands the very faintest chance of making the reader think that the book to which it refers is in the least worth buying. It is simply one among a dozen others figuring in the same list, and this list merely contains a bald announcement that the book has been issued. Indeed, beyond the title, the name of the author, and the price, no other details are mentioned. As likely as not, too, the list appears in an organ which, from its nature, makes no appeal to book-buyers. For example, to fill a column of the Stable Boy's Whisper with an advertisement of somebody's sermons may denote enterprise, but it is not likely to sell a copy. The average publisher, however, who seems constitutionally unable to see an inch beyond his nose, regards the matter from only one point of view when drawing up his precious "list." This is the question of cost. He cannot, or will not, realise that a suitable medium is always the cheapest in the end. Accordingly, he throws away money on obscure and foolish papers which, if they circulate at all, circulate only among people who would much rather have beer than books and who confine their reading matter to betting news and reports of suffragette meetings. The wonder is, accordingly, not that the average book has so poor a sale, but that it has a sale of any description.

Under the circumstances, accordingly, it is not surprising to find that there is a growing custom on the part of authors to eke out the publisher's advertisements with others of their own. Even those novelists who have attained the pinnacle of being "in demand" are by no means coy when it comes to banging the drum, and will bellow the praises of their works as lustily as any auctioneer engaged in selling brass watches to credulous yokels. In this they often display considerable ingenuity and fertility of resource. A favourite plan is to get up a newspaper controversy about the book which they wish to boom. If it is one that has been unfavourably reviewed, all the better, for then they can tell the critics what they think of them—which makes for entertaining reading and brightens the arid wastes of London's "literary" dailies.

Indeed, when it comes to exploiting herself the average lady novelist can give points and a beating to all her masculine confrères put together. One of their number, for example, has just organised what she is pleased to call a "literary competition" in connection with her latest masterpiece. This takes the form of offering prizes for readers who write the "best" criticism upon it. Another much favoured device is to insert references to a book in the "Agony" or "Personal" columns of the morning papers. The sort of thing met with is more or less as follows:—

GEORGE: You positively must read "Pink Pastorals" by —. There is a reference to you on p. 165. Is it true?—MARY.

Or:—

ELIZABETH: Please send me "A Purple Passion" by — as a Christmas present. Everybody is simply raving about it here.—HENRY.

It seems very childish, but presumably it pays.

Fortunately, all London publishers are not alike in their methods, and the more enterprising among them have come to see that the old ways are not necessarily the best ways. Such as these, accordingly, announce their wares boldly, and when they issue a book take care that its existence shall be widely known. At present, however, very few of them seem to regard the boardings as a suitable means of bringing books and buyers into contact with one another. Still, this medium is gradually beginning to be recognised by certain firms that have emerged from the hide-bound traditions of the older houses. A case in point is that of Messrs. —, who have just issued a striking poster of one of the novels on their list. It is not a work of art, perhaps—such as was Aubrey Beardsley's design for "The Yellow Book"—but it at any rate catches the eye and arrests attention.

Where books are concerned, discretion, it may safely be contended, is the better part of advertisement. From a selling point of view, quite as much harm is done by claiming all sorts of marvellous qualities for tenth-rate writers as by leaving the world in ignorance of their existence. A combination of brag and bounce may answer once, but not a second time. Yet, according to some of the firms who adopt these tactics, every author of whom they can get hold is a Kipling and Corelli rolled into one. For fear there should be any doubt about it, they draw up a preliminary "par," which is sent round to the purveyors of "literary gossip" in the evening papers, "for favour of insertion," and which (if accompanied by an advertisement) is duly given hospitality. With a view, however, to making assurance doubly sure, the publisher will add a descriptive note of his own. Here is the modest strain in which one such authority refers to a forthcoming novel:—

In this great human story, which has its setting in a small Western fishing village, Mr. — presents an unconventional view of the position of the married woman. The simple dignity of the style, and the strange spell of the narrative, with its wild dramatic climax, should place — among the masterpieces of English fiction. Order your copy at once, otherwise you may be kept waiting for weeks on the waiting list.

After this, there can be very little left for the critics to say when the "great human story" at length makes its appearance.

A second scheme (and one often adopted when the story is being serialised) takes the form of printing in the advertisement columns a short extract from some particularly striking passage. The idea is to whet the appetite and induce the chance reader to secure the entire mental feast. Such literary hors d'œuvres are always made as sensational as possible, and they invariably break off short in the middle of a thrilling episode. This is the sort of thing with which one meets:—

The dark eyes of the beautiful Countess flashed menacingly. "Unhand me, sir!" she hissed.

For answer, the other seized her by her shapely waist, and then, uttering a fierce cry, hurled her over the frowning crag to the jagged rocks below. As she fell through the air the Countess clutched desperately at the branch of a tree. For a moment it trembled beneath her weight, and then—

For the continuation of this remarkable and soul-stirring story see the current number of —.

Who could decline the opportunity?

The sort of commendation that both publishers and authors value most is one that comes from a clergyman. To obtain this they will angle patiently for weeks at a time. Sooner or later success is practically bound to crown their efforts, since few of even the higher Church dignitaries seem able to resist the temptation of being "drawn." The book is sent to them by the aspiring author, together with a covering letter asking for an expression of opinion regarding it. As soon as this arrives an elegant extract is made from it and printed broadcast. Sometimes, the volume is even lucky enough to obtain a "pulpit puff"—that is, to be made the theme of a sermon. A notable case in point was that of a certain mixture of patchouli and religion masquerading as a novel which recently attracted a favourable mention from the pulpit of Westminster Abbey and achieved a sale of over 300,000 copies. Since then, as may be imagined, the good-natured—but somewhat indiscreet—clerical critic has had books delivered at his door at the rate of a cartload or so per week. However, he has very wisely refused to swallow the bait a second time.

But, after all, the great thing to remember is that publishers' advertisements are only the means to an end, and not the end itself. This is a point of which authors—as a class are rather apt to lose sight.

ITALIAN BACKGROUNDS

I.—THE MOUNTAIN FOREST.

"COME with me from Lebanon, with me from Lebanon, and look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards."

Leave the city in the dust below, the trim gardens and alleys of the town, leave the flat-faced plastered hovels on the hillside of the tillers of the Saturnian soil, the tortured vines, shining with new leaves, the olives silvering like puffs of smoke upon the grain-set slopes, the copsewood of oaks reddening with young leaf over beds of irises, rising among the cool, grey bloom of their leaves. Do not fear there is but little grass, blent with bitter herbs on the summits. Here is the fine-breathed mountain, the immeasurable air, the milk of dangling torrents, the unextinguished hearths of east and west, the cloths of morn and even: for olives you shall have the oil of gladness, instead of wine, the vintage of the Vine of Heaven and milk of torrents from the mountain breasts.

The pebbly way winds among a low growth of oaks just breaking into knots of fine amber leaf, the fresh shoots, varnished as if with rain, are sharp against the blue dome-like sky, without a taint of cloud. The bunches of leaves dance upon the short grey stems of the oaks mottled with white lichen; and mats of budding purple irises straggle by the precipitous way, while purple orchises and blue squills are half hidden by the dewy grass flushed with the first green of Spring. Here, too, are chestnuts, their leaf-fans bursting from their gummy buds, lifting their clear stems and snake-like tangle of roots above the earth which is patched with olive moss, and half covered with drifted oak leaves, shining pebbles and low-growing broom. On past the tangle of trees is the bare promontory of the hill-crest, where a peasant with a basket of stones is throwing them at the lean sheep who are straying among the ledges of the vines below. And all around the dry, singing air, moving about the circle of mountain-crests—a wave-tossed sea of vales and mountain summits, spreading pyramids, blue as the many-faceted sea, flecked on the tops, too, with a foam of snow, frozen in calm as they were rocking towards a fall. Blue as moulded mist, various as the sea, unchanging in splendour save when a rolling indigo cloud-shadow spreads like a blot upon the fields at their feet, where all the towered cities, villages, vineyards and grey olive yards on the lower slopes are merged in blue, aerial, translucent, exquisitely pure. In this ethereal fabric of azure, the most real of realities, the most solid of substances, seem films upon some crystal sphere, infinitely withdrawn and visionary.

The air is windless, and the light streams softly through the haze on the horizon and the soft-edged clouds, not sharply enough to chequer the floor of the wood with a mat of moving shadows. The air is full of the sound of rushing water, the turbulence, the resonance, the smoke of the shivering waterbrooks, the hurry and incoherence of the headlong threads of falls passing like the current of their cooling water-breeze through the long-drawn aerial pines, close set, their trunks tufted with dark moss and mottled with white lichen. Below, in the sloped clearing near the old monastery, the primroses are dropped like stars on the turf, and the sapling beeches unfold in the air their pale down-fringed leaves. It is the divina foresta spessa e viva where Matilda plucks flowers in the meadow on the banks of the river Eunoe.

The long, stony path ascends gradually into the light almost encircling the abrupt mountain, leaving behind it the little hut-like shrines on the pine-shadowed, paved path, the pine-dark gullies, with their volleying streams spraying the mossy stones of their precipitous bed. Beyond the shadow of the pines the track winds through sunny beechen slopes "with shadows numberless," where the red, imperishable autumn leaves fly up in the cool gusts that move about the unfooted slopes of the hills, or rustle when a brown lizard darts from stone to stone over the dry bleached hill grass. The way is fringed with broom, and the light streams upward through the first red-amber knots of the sycamore, through the translucent screen of delicate beech-sprays, fine as thinnest vapour, that clothe from crown to root the grey trunks marbled with white lichen and dark moss. Every now and then from the buff mat of last year's leaves a whirling drift leaps upward with the spirit of unextinguishable mirth over the close sward, which is bright with the silver of tremulous wind flowers, of clear purple crocuses opening their petals to show their inner spark of gold, and blue squills burning like the transparent flame of a fire of drift wood. This mat of myriads, colouring the giant slopes, choking the thread-like brooks under their arching shades, must have remained in the memory of Milton as the strongest image of profusion in his tremendous simile of the fallen angels, who lay

Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks
In Vallombrosa.

And soon the pathways, where the green beeches meet overhead, open before a distant circle of hills, which show like cold and moulded clouds remote, withdrawn in their milky vales, only less fantastic than the clots of cloud thrown up from them like foam sundered from the grey-blue sea. In this finer air, the months have been set back; it is early April, and the beeches are not yet in leaf, their pointed russet buds shine like sparks against the blue of the superincumbent heaven; the turf is dun and sapless, untouched by the dews and breath of Spring; the wind-ruffled crocus grows more sparsely, and here and there glows the five-pointed blue gentian, that arctic flower of the heights; while under the singing wind the beeches dwindle to dwarf shrubs scattered among the drifts of snow that silver the northward slopes, its crystal shining in faint prismatic radiance under the intolerable glory of the sun of heaven, that golden hill-flower that withers daily, and daily is renewed.

The mountain clefts are bright with milky threads of torrents spun from the abrupt heights, spirting down the gullies they blacken with their shivering spray and making the pale leaves of the sapling beech that overhangs it tremble like a flame in a current of air; volleying under the arch that supports the roadway, a thin thread of grey resonant water, then widening into grey and brown shallows, trembling as they ebb down the hill into pale reflections of the far-off blue and white sky. Among a congeries of grey misshapen boulders, green with saturated, sweet-smelling moss, it flies, shadowed by the mast-like trunks of the pines that stream upward and sunward from the clefts of the hill; and the air about it is filled with the tiny drops, with the savour of moss and weed, of the soft rubble of pinings, of odorous chips from some felled and stripped pine that lies, mighty and mightily fallen for the snow-white oxen to drag away down the slopes. And through the blue and mottly interstices of the pines, among the reticulated shadows of their branches that dapple the trough of this headlong torrent, its voice seems to whisper in somewhat inarticulate speech, in the old language of the country, siste viator.

On the floor of the half-lit sanctuary of the tall pines the red beech-leaves lie in crisp drifts, with here and there a silver residuum of unmelted snow; through one far aisle the distance glimmers greyly, as through a darkened window, and nearer, between the framing stems of a pair of trees with "sapless green and heavy foliage dun," a space of plain and valley is included, chequered with shadows of wood and faint divided fields and villages. Here a film of white cloud rises slowly, like an Assumption, with accompanying angels fixed in a solemn tripudio celeste, and whitening into a closer curd in the colder air of the heights, against the blue bloom of the distant pine-wood, and against the long summit of the many-breasted ridge, greening over with budding beeches, where it finally melts into the cloudy sky. Above on these higher slopes are conical turf huts of charcoal-burners, and near by a blackened platform of their labours—the only signs of human life in these solitudes peopled by the silvery web-rooted beeches, whose russet leaves whistle in the wind beside the crowded buds of Spring, and whose fallen myriads bury the light of laughing purple crocuses; higher, again, the dwarfed beeches are left behind for the bare wind-tormented summits, speckled silver bleached thistles and dried heather, with slabs of grey boulders, overscrawled with blots and arabesques of palest lemon and green lichen, and multitudinous weather-stains. The grass, too, is bleached and dry, matted like the locks of wool upon a mountain sheep. By a cairn of scattered stones is a short rude pillar, raised as it were to the genus loci, while above this desolation the air streams, pure and yielding, as over the unfooted sea.

The pale summits send their promontories over the cloven valley like blunt rocks jutting over a wine-faced sea. It is as if one were an insect folded in the flower of the purple iris that opens so freely in the valleys below; the sky and the far-distant horizon—fused into one here and there by a brooding mist—like the pale erect petals of that flower, while the valley and the rear heights are purple as its drooping leaves. Below, in the valley, the cities show like dim indeterminate stains, and lessening villas and farms shine dimly like sprinkled salt; the web of road-ways and rivers but wire-like lines and scars upon the melting surface of the vision.

REVIEWS

A BOSTON FAMILY

The Chippendales. By ROBERT GRANT. Stanley Paul & Co., 6s.)

ON the few occasions when the reviewer confronts a novel which consists of six hundred closely-printed pages, his feelings are apt to be somewhat dismal, but we are sincerely pleased to be able to congratulate the author of this lengthy book on the success with which he has accomplished his almost epic task. It requires considerable courage to introduce so large a number of characters, and great ability to keep them all in view—and in correct perspective—without hopelessly tangling their motives and bothering the reader. Mr. Grant has exercised a very pretty art of selection and management and amid all the competitive interests the thread is never in danger of being lost. From the outset, however, we realise that this is no ordinary glib story to be "skipped" or hurried through. In remarking this we do not intend to convey that it is difficult or an undue strain on the attention. It is not involved either in language or plot, nor does it betray in the least degree that spinning-out process so affected by writers who lack ideas; it comes, in fact, to a perfectly natural conclusion when the fortunes of the principal actors are fairly settled. It is not possible to give any accurate sketch of the story in this notice; we must confine ourselves to a brief indication of its strong points, which lie in the direction of studies of character. The scene is set entirely in Boston, U.S.A., and Henry Chippendale Sumner, the uncompromising young lawyer, is one of the finest types of the "straight," mildly defiant, ascetic Puritans of the older American school that we remember to have met. The story of his confident and clumsy wooing of Priscilla Avery is told with consummate skill, and it is quite with a sigh of relief that we find Priscilla's years of indecision and her strained idealism lapse at last into her surrender to her lover's arms; a little longer, and they would both have been perilously near the age when love's fervours have fled. Her sarcastic tongue never daunted him, and as for a long time she saw only his bad points she is sometimes rather hard on him. She is continually critical:

As she looked at Henry, he reminded her of a hungry—yes, a faithful and well-meaning—dog, on his hind legs, watching for scraps which she dangled before his nose, and just when he thought one of them was his, jerked away. She felt almost like stroking him. But if she were to do so, would he not be certain to bite her in his clumsy efforts to lick her hand?

From which we observe that there was a cruel side to the good Priscilla's heart, although the confusion of her mind did not deceive Henry, who was a fine fellow, if a trifle narrow. The real hero, we suppose, is one Hugh Blaisdell, whose rise from clerk to millionaire is so penetratingly and pitilessly traced, but we are inclined to place the curious, complicated idyll of Sumner and his lady above this in human interest and genuine fascination. It would take a good deal of space merely to allude to the many other people whose careers are mingled with these—the Chippendales as a family, for instance, are numerous. The picture of Harrison Chippendale, the man who has fallen behind, who sees his sons and his friends keen and hot in the modern life, hustling in the front rank, who is so pathetically conscious of the old days when Boston was smaller and the tide flowed more smoothly, and who is such a thorough, patriotic gentleman, is one full of charm and delicate feeling. His interview with the impertinent reporter who calls scenting a family scandal, and his scathing resentment of "smart" newspaper methods, is a telling piece of work:

"And have you seen fit," he asked, "to invade my privacy in order to show me this disgusting screed?"

While Mr. Chippendale's eyes were on the newspaper his visitor reproduced the card which he promptly presented in response to these fiery but august words. As Mr. Chippendale ignored the outstretched hand, he laid it on a little table which held an electric lamp and stepped back. "These are my credentials. My name is Bliffel: on the staff of the Mercury."

"Are you responsible for this outrage?"

"It came to us from an authentic source," replied Mr. Bliffel. "We're the only evening paper which has it; so naturally we want to make hay while the sun shines. . . . We're no worse than the others. The newspaper must live. Its business is to circulate news, not to suppress it. The story is true, isn't it?"

"My brother left a widow, who was once his stenographer, if that's what you mean."

"Formerly in the employ of your nephew, Mr. Sumner, the late candidate for Mayor on the citizen's ticket. And there's a posthumous child—you admitted that." Standing on the hearth-rug with his hands in his side pockets and his legs apart, the visitor was obviously making a magnanimous endeavour to point out to his auditor that he had nothing to complain of. Did not this first citizen stand in need of enlightenment on the score of what every free-born citizen of a democracy was expected to put up with? "That's all we've said," he continued, "though, of course, we had to put it picturesquely. An octogenarian blue-blood marries his typewriter and her posthumous son becomes the heir to millions. Rather striking for conservative Boston. King Cophetua and the beggar maid are back numbers to the general public, but it will want to read about this."

Mr. Chippendale gives the reporter a bit of straight talking, and the man is about to depart with a ruffled spirit—"Wait and see how the yellow journals treat you," he says, "before you get your back up"—when Chauncey Chippendale, a son, happens to call; he, knowing the unfortunate importance of remaining on friendly terms with the Mercury, calms the censured news-gatherer by his tact, while the old man looks on amazed. We should have liked to quote the whole scene, having done it scanty justice by so brief an extract, but it extends to several pages, and our available space is at an end. It must suffice to say for the present that this is one of the really fine books that go to hearten us amid the welter of crass futility which now disgraces the name of literature; that the perusal of it has been a great pleasure, and that our readers who are judges of what is worthy in modern fiction will, we believe, find themselves thoroughly in accord with this opinion.

GOYA TO VELASQUEZ

The School of Madrid. By A. DE BERNETE Y MORET, translated by MRS. STUART ERSKINE. (Duckworth & Co., 7s. 6d.)

"THE School of Madrid" is an account of an interesting and brilliant artistic circle, the school of Spanish painting between Goya and Velasquez, omitting, as superfluous, anything more than a most brief introductory account of the latter, and treating with fuller detail those pupils and followers, and certain contemporaries of the master, whose works had been confused with his, and "whose œuvre had been merged by history in that of the more dominating personality." Throughout the book, the originality of Señor de Bernete y Moret's views, his scholarly and profound study of the art of the seventeenth century, his knowledge of technique, is everywhere remarkable.

"Almost all celebrated painters," he writes, "have gathered around them pupils or imitators who have produced work which very much resembles their own. Of these imitators, there were generally some who had sufficient talent to reproduce the external appearance of the style imitated and to produce pictures which, painted at the same time, in the same country, from the same or very similar models, and with like colours and canvas, have been, after the lapse of centuries, confused with the original work of the master. Only deep and prolonged study and a constant comparison of one with another permit the critic to differentiate between the typical, original and unique works of the artist and those of his imitators." Hence the fascinating game of attributions.

The personality and work of the giant Velasquez have been studied by so many critics, especially in recent years, that the author has decided to abandon this study, as he "could do no more than repeat what others have said already." He is content with placing in its position and in its time the figure of the great naturaliste. But a clearer definition is given to this figure by the illumination of his background, the study of the terra incognita which has hitherto surrounded him, his obscure contemporaries, and his artistic offspring, the school of Madrid. A critical analysis of the doubtful pictures ascribed to Velasquez, which closely resemble his work in externals, but have not the stamp of undoubted originals, leads the author—as it had led his father, the well-known critic, de Bernete, in his work on Velasquez—to the conclusion that they are the work of Juan Bautista Martinez del Mazo, pupil and son-in-law of the master, whose works are here for the first time studied in detail. The three chapters devoted to del Mazo, with his prodigious talent for imitation, who gained by assimilation not indeed the fundamental qualities of his master, but what was purely external in his works, are of great interest, though the author states his results somewhat briefly, and in a form which only partially suggests the synthesis of complex impressions derived from a close study of these works. His starting-point in the study of del Mazo is the analysis of the "Family of the Artist," in the Imperial Gallery of Vienna, which, as de Bernete has written in his "Velasquez," "supplied the means of clearing up all the doubts which troubled me relative to several pictures attributed to Velasquez. At first sight several parts of the composition seem to have been painted by him, but compare the elements of this picture with those of authentic works and you will find in the arrangements of the groups, and in the drawing of each of the figures, so much that is commonplace and insignificant that it is difficult to understand why there could have been much doubt as to the authorship of the canvas." The work, though of the school of Velasquez, has nothing of the elegance and grace of the greater painter, and is remarkable for its peculiarly gauche and uninspired grouping. It is a work of talent, as compared with the work of genius.

Signor de Bernete y Moret follows his father in claiming for del Mazo three well-known paintings once universally attributed to Velasquez—the portrait of Admiral Adrian Pulido Pareja (rejected on account of its heavy and ill-drawn feet, the inartistic curve of the left arm, and the uncertainty of the execution in some parts from the works of Velasquez); the Lady with a Mantilla at Devonshire House, and Prince Balthazar Carlos in the Riding School at Grosvenor House, the latter, with its very frank and bold touch, a very clever imitation of the master. The fine portrait of Philip IV. in the Dulwich Gallery, and that of Prince Balthazar Carlos at the age of sixteen, in the Prado Museum, are also given by father and son to del Mazo.

From a study of these works, and from del Mazo's interesting landscapes, the figure of del Mazo, who has been forgotten for so many years and whose name has been overshadowed by that of his master, gradually emerges. As in art, so in life, del Mazo is always by the side of his father-in-law, "he seems to have had no wish to detach himself from his master, or to distinguish himself either as an official or as an artist." He is absolutely in bondage to the greater painter, from "the ensemble of the figure to the most insignificant detail." His work is lacking in design, poor also in the setting and disposition of groups and figures, and of a more opaque colour than that of Velasquez; but with his wonderful talent for the imitation of his master's style, the earlier attribution of many of his works to Velasquez is not incomprehensible, especially in the case of his portraits of single figures. This peculiar talent, the author adds, "is not rare among Spanish artists, although it seldom rises to such a pitch of perfection as it does with Mazo. The Spanish temperament has, in all ages, shown a facility for assimilating all sorts of knowledge, and the racial instinct showed itself in art as it did in other developments." The author passes in review Carreño, and those pupils, or rather successors, of Velasquez, who carried on the great tradition of Spanish art, down to Claudio Coello, the last artistic "heir of the house" of Velasquez, thus bringing the art of Madrid down to its decline and fall in the last few years of the seventeenth and the first few years of the eighteenth century. The reign of Charles II. was one of decadence and political ruin for Spain; it was also the beginning of the decadence of the great tradition in painting.

The King was desirous of decorating the principal staircase and vault of the church of the Escorial, and "having heard of the great reputation acquired by Luca Giordano, sent for him to accomplish this work." Coello understood at once how this would turn out, and when Don Cristobal Ontañon said to him, "Giordano is coming to teach you how to make a great deal of money," he replied, "Yes, sir, and to absolve us from our sins and our faults and to take away our scruples."

The advent of the Neapolitan artist, in 1692, marks the introduction of a new and mannered style, quite opposed to the national genius. He broke the Spanish tradition, and when he left Spain, "leaving nothing behind him but his works, the Spaniards who attempted to imitate his style were not successful; the realistic and sober Spanish art was not suited to produce works of the type of Giordano." He at once won the favour of the King, and in consequence he was charged with commissions and yet more commissions, which he executed to the great admiration of the ignorant, and with that deplorable facility which earned for him the title of fa presto; he reigned, at last, as sovereign master of that school which he had debased and dragged down into a complete decadence."

The translation of Señor de Bernete y Moret's manuscript is excellent; the only erratum to be noticed is on page 182, where Epimetheus is given for Epimetheus, in "Pandora and Epimetheus."

SHORTER REVIEWS

Manual of Occasional Offices for the Use of the Clergy. Compiled by the REVEREND J. L. SAYWELL. (London: Cope and Fenwick.)

ALTHOUGH the compilers of this manual inform us that it has been "called into existence by the inadequacy of the Book of Common Prayer to meet the various occasions and manifold activities of the Church, it is difficult to see the necessity for this work. It has all been done before, and much better and more amply done, in that admirable vade mecum, the Priests' Prayer Book, which contains a great number of offices and prayers for every possible occasion, and, moreover, is drawn up from strictly Liturgical sources. In the manual before us we notice some unnecessary alterations and departure from precedent. There are also many remarkable omissions: no offices being provided for the Visitation of the Sick in special cases, except one for the administration of unction. Nor is the office for hearing Confession included, nor any office for the Communion of the Sick with the Reserved Sacrament. Only one prayer for the departed occurs, at the end of an office with the curious title: "Reading Over." There is an Order for the Burial of Unbaptized, with a wholly unauthorised and indefensible rubric implying that the insane who commit suicide are not entitled to the ordinary service. There are a considerable number of very modern collects, but the spiritual art of writing collects has been long in abeyance, as is well known. But it is possible that those priests (and we fear they are many) who are not acquainted with the wealth of the Church's Liturgical lore may find this book fairly useful, so far as it goes.

The Pools of Silence. By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.
(T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

MR. STACPOOLE has succeeded, as is usual with him, in writing a strong and very readable story, but he has weakened it by bringing in a "cause"; few novelists can venture to do this and at the same time retain a high level of interest. He attacks the Congo administration, and makes a good many sweeping statements which can hardly be profitably discussed in a review, but which in fairness we must say he seems to substantiate by referring to various authorities. Apart from this, the story is a study of a mighty hunter, one Berselius, who after spells of civilised life in Paris hears the call of the tropical forest and sets forth after big game, ostensibly, but really to satisfy his lust of killing; his nature is essentially ferocious and bloodthirsty. From the point of view of Dr. Paul Quincy Adams, a man who becomes his travelling medical adviser and assistant, the plot is unfolded, and up to a certain incident the attention of the reader is held irresistibly. Then, with the stampede of a herd of elephants, in which Berselius is knocked down and loses his memory, the whole thing becomes tame and unconvincing; Mr. Stacpoole's good fairy seems to desert him, and the result is disappointment.

The paragraphs of description in the book are often very fine. Even if they are sometimes a trifle strained the effect is at least original. We may instance a few lines from the first page:

The sun was setting over Paris, a blood-red and violent-looking sun, like the face of a bully staring in at the window of a vast chill room. The bank of cloud above the west, corrugated by the wind, seemed not unlike the lowermost slats of a Venetian blind; one might have fancied that a great finger had tilted them up whilst the red, callous, cruel face took a last peep at the frost-bitten city, the frost-bound country—Montmartre and its windows, winking and bloodshot; Bercy and its barges; Notre Dame, where icicles, large as carrots, hung from the lips of the gargoyles, and the Seine clipping the cité and flowing to the clean but distant sea.

Everybody may not care for so urgent and unpoetic a metaphor as that exploited in the opening lines, but not many people will miss reading it. "The Pools of Silence" does not rise, we think, to the level of some of Mr. Stacpoole's previous work, but it is certainly a relief from the ordinary course of fiction. And if the author would drop his irritating habit of using a comma when a semi-colon is demanded the pleasure of many to whom these things make a difference would be increased.

Wheel Magic. By J. W. ALLEN. (John Lane, 3s. 6d.)

A FRIEND suggested to Mr. Allen that there was as yet no Izaak Walton of cycling, and that he might be the man to come. But there is still no Izaak Walton of the road; it is a far cry from the inimitable manner of the classic to the self-conscious but pleasant manner of this modern. Mr. Allen is quite conscious of it. "The little book is done; but it is not the thing we dreamed of. It is a quite other thing. Even from the first I knew in my heart that it was not for me, in the good, old, unsophisticated fashion, simply to set down my delight. From the first I knew that, so soon as I took pen in hand, I should become that anxious, posing, really contemptible being, a petty artist. . . . I knew, even at the first, that Izaak Walton is dead and has no fellow." In "Wheel Magic"—which bears the alternative title, "Revolutions of an Impressionist"—the author speaks "with a strange sense of joy" of his bicycle. He blesses the machine that enables him to find and to see. His delight on the road recalls the fervour and the pleased expectancy of Stevenson's walker who "cannot tell whether he puts his knapsack on or takes it off with more delight." His enthusiasm knows no bounds. "The perfected cyclist," he writes, "is a wandering spirit, full of eyes, like the beast in the Revelation. All the burden of humanity falls from him as he mounts. He has no past, neither does his future extend beyond the flying day. His is the zenith of optimism. The flower by the wayside is for him the sweetness of the world made visible. His easy downward glide is the very movement of life. Sorrow and pain are far-off accidental things, as irrelevant as death. All toil and vanity his wheels have left behind. The abodes of poverty are bright with his happiness. A puncture, a patch of stones in the roadway, a dust-compelling motor, these are the worst of life's troubles. The goodness of God is manifest in the sunshine." We hope this is all true—for Mr. Allen's sake! But why will the pilgrims of to-day insist so loudly on their means of locomotion, whether motor or bicycle? Can they not get to their destination, like Childe Harold, without a word of coach or diligence? In Mr. Allen's book we hear more of his machine than of the countryside whose beauties he feels so keenly, and of which, when he can forget his bicycle, he gives some charming vignettes. A weakness of the book is a certain poverty of subject matter. One whole chapter is given to the accidents common to bicyclists, and such faint ghosts of unimportant vicissitudes; while a wet afternoon and trifling with an atlas is the motif of another. In two the barrenness of reality is supplemented with long dreams—or, rather, nightmares—at an inn. But, as Dr. Johnson said, "Adventures to the adventurous."

Elizabeth Visits America. By ELINOR GLYN. (Duckworth & Co., 6s.)

MR. PRICE COLLIER, in a recent book, explains why the Englishman is the most generally disliked of men. "It is," he says, "the superiority or superciliousness of the race," and he suggests that the American enthusiastic and indiscriminating hospitality to foreigners, especially to Englishmen and Englishwomen, is simply looked upon as an acknowledgment of this superiority. Perhaps this book, with its note of superiority, will be another ground for dislike. It presents the superficial view of one who has seen America rapidly and as a guest, and treats only of the things which leap to the eye in the everyday life of the nation. It is not, of course, a sober study, like Mr. H. G. Wells's book, or M. Bourget's. Elizabeth's contributions to our knowledge of America are not considerable. "America is too quaint," she writes. She deplores the snobbishness in America, and yet can write pleasantly enough, "I suppose you have to be up where we are for it all to seem nonsense and not to matter." Her views on the question of divorce in America are equally characteristic. "The tiresome part" of the facilities for divorce is, "that it must quite take away the zest of forbidden fruit that European nations get out of such affairs," while flirtations, to a married woman, have no zest, "because you can get a divorce and marry the man so easily, it makes it always une affaire de jeune fille." Mormonism, as a system, is ridiculous, in her opinion, in a country which is generous enough to allow men and women as many mates as they please, so long as they have them one by one and not all at once. "A man to have six wives is an impossible idea—specially as now it is not necessary the way they behave." Surprise is expressed at the virtuous conduct of the American women, and an amazing explanation of this is put into the mouth of an elderly grande dame of Southern blood:

"The young men nearly all drink too many cocktails, and that is what makes them so unreserved when they get to their clubs, so the women can't have them for lovers, because they talk about it."

The progress of the narrative is constantly interrupted by protestations of innocence surprising in a person of Elizabeth's often-expressed tendencies, and absurd enough when one remembers her earlier visits.

Perhaps we have considered Mrs. Glyn too seriously in the matter of her criticism of life. It is an impertinent and vivacious book; not Lord Chesterfield's Letters, but the Letters of Elizabeth. But her English cannot be taken too seriously, as we pass from clumsy construction to confused thought, from incredible grammar to haphazard punctuation, surprising in a person who is able to "discuss some phase of the Renaissance" at luncheon, and to resent a mistake in the knowledge of that period. Here are some astonishing sentences:

"The footmen are in full dress with silk stockings and one or two places they had them powdered."

"Nobody appeared English—I mean of origin, even if their name is Smith or Brown, every other nation, with the strong stamp of 'American' dominating whatever country they originally hailed from, but not English."

"I asked him what his views were about us in England. We of the leisured class, and he said he thought most of us were pretty sound."

"The effect of Wild is intense."

Altogether a deplorable book, deplorably illustrated with thumb-nail sketches by an untrained hand. It is more than probable that Elizabeth will not pay a second visit to America.

Round the Lake Country. By the REV. H. D. RAWNSLEY. (Maclehose, Glasgow, 5s.)

DISPUTANTS are often engaged over the small-change of conversation in fruitless efforts to decide which is the most beautiful district of England. In the nature of things it must be a question of temperament and associations, since there is no standard of natural beauty. One man will prefer the flat estuaries of the east coast, with their bird-haunted solitudes, their wonderful sunsets, and their expanses of poppies and shallow meadows; another will assert that he is a man of Kent, and therefore (curious egotism!) that county must come first on the list; Yorkshiremen with reason claim that their fine river-valleys and moors and ranges should give their big county a high place; Devonshire men are notably pugnacious where the honour of the bonnie West is concerned, and dwellers in the lake country yield to none others the palm. So when experts differ we will not place ourselves in an invidious position by attempting to evolve any conclusive theory on the subject. At the same time it must be admitted that the rarity of lake scenery in these islands makes a very strong point for those who write of Cumberland and the neighbourhood—many people hardly ever saw more in the way of inland sheets of water than a town reservoir until they visited the Wordsworth country.

Canon Rawnsley is not so emphatic on the beauty of his chosen land, perhaps, as on the richness of its historical and ecclesiastical memories; he probably thinks that we have already plenty of exponents of the artistic and descriptive kind, beginning, of course, with the poet whose name is for ever linked with this corner of England. We do not mean to insinuate that in this book the natural charms of the district are not alluded to, but it specialises in happy stories of the olden times and explanations of the various monuments and crosses which the traveller meets with in profusion. In so doing it is to be placed in a far higher category than the mere guide-book; it forms a most useful and interesting companion for anyone of an inquiring turn of mind who contemplates explorations among these delightful mountain-ways. All along the coast are remains of the settlements of the Viking rovers and the ancient races; hut circles of stone, not unlike the weird Dartmoor "rings," are found in many spots—at Hampsfell, Thwaites Fell, up Crosby Ghyll, and at Seascale, to mention but a few. The Roman road of Agricola can still be traced, and the remains of a Roman general's house in a remarkable state of preservation can be seen at Ravenglass. The author has some excellent comments on the evidence of the dialect and the place-names as to old occupation by invaders from over the North Sea:

Anyone who looks at a map of Cumberland and Lancashire—north-of-the-sands, will note the abundance of Scandinavian village and hill names. The terminations of thwaite, rigg, fell, dale, seat, side, wick, garth, how, holme, abound. Those who journey up Dunner Dale or on the Thurston Water (Coniston) or to Gosforth, will find remains of Thor the Thunderer, while as they go from Ulpha's town by Dalton to Ulpha in the Duddon vale, may have echoes of Norse chieftains, Ulph and Dali, in their ears. If they enter into the farmhouses they will see the "rannel boke" and the creamstick made of the Viking's holy ash-tree or Igdrasil as charm against the bewitching of the milk. . . . They will hear the old Norse tongue spoken as the shepherd bids them see "hoo t' sheeps raking to-dairy." . . . If they look at the blue eyes and the fine-cut profile and heavy jaws, and large limbs and long arms of the shepherds and farm folk of the dales they speak with, they will feel that just such were the Norse sea-rangers, who probably in two invasions under their leaders, Thorolf and Ingolf, between 874 and 920 A.D., ran their beaked ships across from the Isle of Man to Ravenglass and the Fore Ness, and came with further force to take complete possession of the Lake Country between 1000 and 1060 A.D.

The analogy between the old Norse legends and the central facts of the Christian faith is pointed out well. "Odin is sung of in the Sagas as having offered himself to himself, and as hanging for nine whole nights on a wind-rocked tree sore wounded by a spear." Of the resemblances the Christian teachers of the ninth and tenth centuries were quick to take advantage. "If the Norsemen had their tree of life, so had the Christians in Christ and His cross their tree of life, whose leaves were for the healing of the nations." And with such memories in our minds it becomes a fascinating study to inspect the mysterious carved crosses at Gosforth and other places, each cross, of almost imperishable stone, representing by figure and letter some myth or some story to be impressed on the minds of the strong, simple men gathered round it. "Crosses were set up," says Canon Rawnsley, "at a time when the congregation that assembled here remembered their Norse myths, but had accepted Christ."

Of St. Bees, and the poem of Beowulf, a most interesting chapter is made; another treats of St. Cuthbert's last journey in Cumberland; the Countess Pillar and its story forms the subject of a third digression.

In fact, the author has in quite a noteworthy manner compiled on the history of the district a treatise which is so compact that it calls for admiration on that point alone, leaving out of consideration the literary graces of the narratives, which are by no means scanty. In avoiding the conventional manner Canon Rawnsley has done well, and his book is a welcome addition to the literature of the celebrated scenes which form its theme.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE POETS

It is a common fallacy to suppose that what is clearly expressed must necessarily be lacking in depth; and, on the other hand, that what is unintelligible must as necessarily be profound. Poets have often deliberately played upon this erroneous notion, and by a studied obscurity of utterance have won reputation for depth of thought. Wycherley had this type of poet in his mind when he put into the mouth of Mr. Novel, in the "Plain-Dealer," his advice to the incipient dramatist to write his plays in verse, on the ground that rhyme "often makes mystical nonsense pass with the critics for wit." Never was truer word spoken. Throughout our literature there has arisen from time to time a school of poets whose common doctrine seems to have been that obscurity is the soul of wit. Under Elizabeth the idea found expression in the tortured words and suffocating metaphors of Chapman, and above all in the insane theory of English prosody propounded by Richard Stanyhurst. This worthy maintained that quantity rather than accent ought to be the guiding principle of English as of Latin metre. In accordance with his theory he translated the first four books of the Æneid. The result is a literary monstrosity.

For the unsauerye rakhel with collops bludred yfranked
With chuffe chaffe wyneops like a gourd bourrachoe replennisht,

His nodil in crossewise wresting droune droups to the groundward,

In belche gelp vometing with dead sleape snortyng the collops
Raw with wyne soused, we doe pray toe supernal asemblye.
Round with al embaying thee muffle maffe koller; eke hastily
With tooles sharp pointed wee boarde and perced his oane light,

That stood in his lowring front gloomish malleted onelye.

To the initiated, the above lines (chosen at random) tell how Ulysses blinded the Cyclops Polyphemus. Nash in his preface to Greene's "Arcadia" (1589) mildly parodied this work:

Then did he make heaven's vault to rebound with rounce, robble, bobble
Of ruffe, raffie roaring, with thwicke, thwack, thurlerie, bouncing.

It is not too much to say that the original is at least as silly as the parody; yet Southey, in his "Horæ Otiosiores," professes to find Stanyhurst "very entertaining," and, to a philologist, a very instructive writer." Thus is the wit justified of his witticism; whilst nonsense masquerading in rhyme has seldom lacked sympathetic critics and an admiring public.

Stanyhurst was still living when, under the first of the Stuarts, the fantastic conceits and the perverted ingenuity of the metaphysical poets, Crashaw, Donne, Quarles, and Herbert became the vogue. The greatest of these was Donne. His best work is, however, marred by remote analogies and absurdly incongruous similes. In one poem he complains that his affection "is grown corpulent," and he is obliged to limit it "to a sigh a day." Shrewd old Ben Jonson had no illusions as to the metaphysical school of poets. He saw that Donne and his fellows were too witty to swim.

In one of his conversations with Drummond he said that he "esteemed Donne the first poet in the world in some things, but that he would perish for not being understood."

This mental obliquity, however, is not indigenous to England. Le Sage has justly ridiculed the folly of such writers in the person of the literary barber in "Gil Blas." "You find this sonnet unintelligible?" asks the poetical shaver, in explaining his method to the hero, "so much the better, my dear fellow! Sonnets, odes, and indeed all works which attempt the sublime are not adapted to the simple and the natural; obscurity is their chief merit. It is sufficient if the poet thinks he himself understands what he means."

Shakespeare himself has sometimes fallen under the temptation to write in riddles. In Act IV., Scene 4, of "All's Well that Ends Well," for instance, occurs the line:

All's well that ends well: still the fine's the crown.

It does not at first dawn on the reader that Shakespeare has been betrayed into making a feeble jest on the motto, "Finis coronat opus." Another instance of a meaningless verse in Shakespeare is the well-known line in Mrs. Quickly's description of Falstaff's death in "Henry V.," Act II., Scene 4, which in the original text read:

His nose was as sharp as a pen, and a table of greene fields.

A friend suggested to the commentator Theobald that the verse should be:

His nose was as sharp as a pen, and 'a talked of greene fields;

whereupon Theobald at once improved upon the hint by writing:

His nose was as sharp as a pen, and 'a babbled of greene fields;

an emendation which had been generally adopted.

Such lapses on the part of the great are a constant snare to the lesser men, and the great satirists from Horace downwards have levelled their vitriolic utterances against those who affect the vices of their betters. In this way many a poetaster has been rescued from oblivion, and "damned to everlasting fame." It was thus with the unhappy Shadwell, who in an evil moment had the temerity to attack Dryden. His lesson was drastic:

Shadwell alone, of all my sons, is he
Who stands confirmed in full stupidity.
The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense.

The biting satire of "Mac Flecknoe" holds the name of Shadwell up to infamy and contempt, and he is known to posterity as the Prince of Dullards. But it is written, "He who laughs last, laughs longest." After the Revolution Dryden was removed from the Laureateship, and the butt of generous canary went to beguile the palate of Thomas Shadwell, his bitterest foe, who was elected to reign in his stead. But however much nonsense is to be found in Shadwell's work, for sheer inanity it would be difficult to match Dryden's own line,

My wound is great because it is so small.

On the first representation of the play in which this rhetorical gem occurs it is related that Buckingham, at this point, rose from his seat, and, mimicking the voice and gesture of the actor, finished the couplet with

Then 'twould be greater were it none at all!

Coming to the latter half of the 18th century, it is at least probable that Macpherson's "Ossian" owed half its popularity to the stimulus derived from its frequent unintelligibility. In our own day it is scarcely necessary to recall the many occasions on which Robert Browning and Mr. Meredith have fallen under the spell of the obscure; whilst we can often only divine the suggestive beauty which the Symbolists, and the poets of the modern Celtic Renaissance (among whom there is good reason to class M. Maeterlinck), so seldom do more than half reveal to us.

A DOUBTFUL AFFAIR

THE factory hooter proclaimed to the world within its range the fact that six o'clock had arrived. Its deep-throated, stentorian buzz, stifling all other sounds, penetrated into the depths of distant engine-rooms, crept through the rumble of the grinding-mills, and echoed across the water from the heights beyond. Loose papers, held in the hands of the office clerks, responded to the vibration of the air by a faint "tickling," and the invoices on files rattled. Two miles away, in the town, when the wind was right, people set their watches by the swelling note, which at that distance became musical; while close at hand, amid the dust and clatter of the mills, the men of the day-shift heard it as a welcome signal of release.

The entrance of the boiler-room abutted on the narrow quay-side. From the opposite wharf, on the sunniest of days, it showed as a black, cavernous hole in the high, weathered wall, with two or three luminous specks gleaming in its remoter recesses. If the onlooker were sufficiently curious to stroll round the dock-head and enter, his eyes would require a minute or more to accustom themselves to the gloom, and then, in the dusky light of the nude, yellow gas-jets, he would distinguish the shadowy circles of four immense boilers frowning down on him like black, impassive faces, and he would notice that the air was surfeited with a certain ceaseless, sleepy hiss that carried with it a rather alarming sensation of power held in leash. Before he had time to note much more he would probably find that the blue eyes of Tom Burton were looking into his from a smeared but genial face; and Tom, if the stranger showed an enquiring turn of mind, would most likely give him a handful of cotton-wool and take him round.

Tom stood at the door, having closed his dampers to check the draught (for there was an hour's interval at six o'clock, and the chief snubbed you if he came round and found the steam roaring off), to watch a big coal-steamer coming in to the opposite quay. The strong rays of the summer sun painted a bronze-like sheen on her dark, curving side, and as she emerged from the golden haze of the harbour she took upon herself the airs and graces of a liner. At her not unshapely bows a lessening curl of foam made a speck of pure white; all the rest was colour: blue of the harbour, gold of the sky, greys and greens and faint, fine purples of the middle distance, where several indeterminate shapes of vessels took their way along the buoyed channels. Yet with all this colour the eyes were rested by regarding the scene, for not a single tint was intrusive or flamboyant; it resembled a delicate pastel drawing, and seemed as though everything had been softened by a curtain of fine gauze. The boat slowed until her bows merely marked the apex of an advancing triangle of ripples, and the sinuous reflections of her masts, cordage, and thick, stained funnel became almost as steady as herself. Nearer and nearer she crept, swerving to a spin of her wheel till parallel with her berth, the blackest thing in the picture, except that uncommonly black hole where Tom leaned against a rusty waste-pipe and gazed at her. Already her men had removed the great tarpaulins from her hatches and uncovered the cranes; on the granite coping stood others, neither sailors nor landsmen, blue-jerseyed, waiting for the flung ropes. These flew across, uncoiling in mid-air, and with shouts and hoarse orders were hauled in until the heavy, many-ply cable came dripping ashore. The weighty bights were carried along and made fast; a few feet farther glided the great tramp-steamer, then, with a surly backward swish of her screw, she came to rest.

A little waif, the kind of boy that haunts all water-side localities of large towns, had also watched the arrival from his post on the top of a pile of timber, and now, clambering down, came shambling aimlessly along the quay. His rough, light hair—he wore no cap—was fluttered about his eyes by the evening breeze; every now and then he brushed it back with a hasty movement of a dirty little hand. Clothes, in the sense which a well-to-do person assigns to that word, he had none; it would have puzzled a tailor to dissect or to name the conglomeration of shoddy material hanging round the poor little chap. His shoes gaped, and held together with string; his coat—since one must give it some designation—would most certainly never pass on to anyone else after he had discarded it, it almost settled the question by dropping to pieces; his trousers were a masterpiece of patch-work. Tom Burton transferred his attention to the unkempt, grimy little mortal as it moved here and there in front of him, picking up stray bits of stick and rubbish, alert for other people's leavings. The boy was happy, it seemed, for he whistled as he wandered; brave blue eyes he owned, too; they shone finely when he faced the sunlight, although his cheeks were pinched.

From the deck of the tramp ■ stoker—come up for a breather before he started on donkey-engine duty, unloading—also watched the boy, contemplatively. Presently a banana shot over the intervening strip of water and skidded at the youngster's feet. He dodged after it and made short work of devouring it, peering across and laughing, the merry little imp, when he caught sight of the form that leaned carelessly over the rail of the steamer.

"Hungry, sonny?" called the stoker, his face wrinkling into a cheerful, encouraging grin.

"Yas," answered the boy, his eyes glistening.

"Catch, then!"

Over flew another ripe banana. The boy rushed forward to catch it, slipped and fell . . . there was ■ splash, and a shrill cry. There were two bigger splashes immediately after, and numberless whirls of grime and dirty bubbles, and dark, liquid lanes, marking where the two men had plunged in and the black mud of the bottom been disturbed.

Tom emerged first, then the stoker, and, treading water, they both looked round for the scrap of humanity at whose call, without a moment's conscious thought, they had taken the leap. Something was floating out helplessly past the end of the stone pier, turning slowly in circles with eddies of the receding tide. Both men swam for that pale, pitiful little gleam of yellow hair, and Tom, reaching the boy first, pushed him towards the slippery, green-coated steps that led down to the water near the end of the jetty; the other man came up in time to help, and fortunately, for Tom, being portly, was a bit blown. Together they brought the boy to the boiler-house, and there were many encouraging shouts from those on board the steamer who had heard the splashes and crowded to the side.

Bedraggled and panting they were, but their burden looked half dead and very white. He had not been in the water more than a minute, perhaps, but his reserve of life-force was too evidently very scanty. His wet hair shone like clear gold in the deepening rays of the sun, and the water that trickled from his shapeless garments traced bright lines and formed little pools among the coal-dust that lay thickly over the cobbles of the quay. The men looked anxious as they laid him on a bench. Tom kicked open the furnace-doors of one of the boilers, and dragged the bench in front of it, wrapping a sack tenderly round the quiet form. The rich, strong glow of the huge fires beat straight on the boy, making his soaked odds-and-ends steam steadily, betraying, as the men went through the necessary movements to restore him, the pitiful thinness of his arms, the leanness of his poor body.

His face, which had shown a false ruddiness in that warm illumination, by and by was tinged with a shade of real colour from within, and he opened his eyes. Just then there was a sound of running feet, and a woman, hard-faced, untidy, stood silhouetted in the doorway against the outside radiance.

"O, my Gawd!" she cried, seeing them bending over the listless form. "O, my Gawd! is he dead?" And she reeled to a heap of coal in the corner, sat there, plaining, repeating her exclamation, wringing her miserable hands. The two men took but little notice of her, striving to fan the tiny, flickering life-flame into a steadier burning. Tom's tea-can had been placed in a corner of the furnace close to the door; in two minutes its contents were nearly boiling: the hot liquid revived the boy, and he came round quickly. . . .

Tom picked up the queer little shape in his strong, hairy arms, and turned to the woman.

"Now then, missis, you'd better take him home quick, an' keep him warm," he said, gruffly, for he did not like the look of her. "Wait a minute." He gave his burden to the other man, and, picking up a dry sack, slashed with his pocket-knife a large hole through its bottom, holding it and turning it for a minute in front of the roaring fires. Then, slipping it deftly over the head of the boy, who looked on wonderingly, he pressed the warm, coarse folds comfortably round the dank, drowsy figure.

"Now, mum, can you carry him?"

Apparently she could not, for even as she stood waiting she swayed ominously, her eyes staring, her lips muttering unintelligible words. So the boy was set upon his feet, a quaint, sad little spectacle, to take the woman's hand. The two men stood at the doorway watching, comprehending dimly a tragedy of life that might be worse than the averted tragedy of death. She led him off. Her words came back to them thickly and indistinctly as she jerked him along by the wrist.

"Ah, you little devil, you—" The boy began to cry quietly.

Tom and the stoker of the tramp exchanged understanding glances, and stood for a while talking, frowning, following with their eyes the two who shuffled along in the sunshine. The snarling syllables gradually became unrecognisable as words.

A bell jangled in the boiler-house behind. Tom disappeared in the gloom to slice his fires, to open his dampers—for it was seven o'clock—and to change his steaming overalls; while his companion, glancing thoughtfully at the red sails of a trawler that was running out on the freshening wind, lit a short, shabby pipe. Presently he turned, facing inwards, hands in pockets.

"Mate!"

"Hello!" answered Tom, pausing and looking up in the act of clearing out the clinkers, bathed in the fierce heat.

"Better 've let the kid drown, p'raps."

"Shouldn't wonder," shouted Tom, slicing away vigorously. The other, with a brief nod, sauntered round the edge of the silent dock-head back to his ship.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES

ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THE last meeting of this Society for the present session was held on Wednesday afternoon, the 16th instant, at 70 Victoria Street, Westminster, Mr. H. Mellish, President, in the chair.

A paper by Mr. R. C. Mossman, F.R.S.E., on the "Interdiurnal Variability of Temperature in Antarctic and Sub-Antarctic Regions" was read by the Secretary. The author discussed the day to day difference in the mean temperature of successive days at a few places in the Antarctic regions for which the necessary detailed daily observations are available. The greatest mean annual temperature variability—viz., 59° —was recorded during the "drift" of the Belgica in the ice-pack, this high value being closely followed by a mean of 53° at the South Orkneys. In the Victoria Land region, Ross Island and Cape Adare have a somewhat lower temperature variability of 45° , the values of the southern station being higher in summer and autumn and lower in winter and spring than at the northern station. South Georgia occupies an intermediate position between a continental and oceanic climate in its curve of variability, the mean monthly values varying according to the proximity of the pack ice. At this station the seasonal values show a small variation, and this is also the case at Ushuaia in Tierra del Fuego. The variability at the Falkland Islands and New Year's Island is very small, pointing to the conserving influence exerted by the insular conditions which prevail at these places. The maximum variability occurs in winter, and the minimum in summer, at the three Antarctic stations as well as at South Georgia and the South Orkneys. The smallest variability at any season for any station occurs at the South Orkneys in summer, being only 14° . It is at this season that cloud amount and fog frequency are at a maximum, while at the same time rapidly moving cyclonic disturbances are of infrequent occurrence.

Mr. Ernest Gold described some experiments which he and Dr. W. Schmidt had made with a view of ascertaining if appreciable errors could enter into the temperature recorded in balloon ascents owing to errors in the alcohol-carbonic acid method of testing the apparatus.

Mr. L. C. W. Bonacina read a brief paper advocating the use of freely exposed thermometers in addition to sheltered ones.

LINNEAN SOCIETY OF LONDON.

GENERAL MEETING, 3RD JUNE, 1909.

DR. D. H. SCOTT, F.R.S., President, in the chair.

The minutes of the Anniversary Meeting of the 24th May, 1909, were read and confirmed.

Mr. Richard Siddoway Bagnall was proposed as a Fellow.

The Lady Isabel Mary Peyronnet Browne, Capt. Stanley Smyth Flower, Mr. Valavanur Subramania Iyer, M.A. Madras Univ., Miss Julia Lindley, and Mr. William Robert Price, B.A. Cantab., were elected Fellows.

The President announced that he had appointed the following as Vice-Presidents for the ensuing year:—Sir Frank Crisp, Mr. Horace W. Monckton, Prof. E. B. Poulton, and Lieut.-Col. Prain.

The first exhibition was by Prof. Dendy, F.R.S., Sec.L.S., of photomicrographs showing nuclear division in Galtonia candicans, Decne., and nuclear division and fertilisation in Ascaris megalocephala.

The President added some observations on the interest of these slides.

Mr. A. D. Cotton, F.L.S., showed dried and recent specimens in formalin, of Colpomenia sinuosa, Derb's & Sol., from Weymouth, explaining how this Mediterranean species had advanced during the last few years up the French coast, into the English Channel; it was believed to act injuriously to young oysters, by breaking them adrift on its rising by buoyancy when distended with air.

An animated discussion followed, in which the following joined:—Mr. E. M. Holmes, Dr. J. C. Willis, Prof. Dendy, and Mr. J. C. Shenstone, Mr. Cotton replying.

The first paper was by Mr. A. R. Horwood—"On Calamites (Calamitina) Schutzei, Stur, and on the correspondence between the length of internodes and the position and function of the short internode in the genus Calamites and in the recent Equisetaceæ"—which was communicated by Mr. E. E. Lowe, F.L.S.

The author stated that a specimen of Calamites Schutzei, Stur, shortly to be figured, exhibits graphically the fistular character of the stem in Calamites, a specimen 3 feet long having been split into two portions longitudinally and so preserved.

In the same specimen (from the Main Coal, Stanton-under-Bardon, Leics.) and in another from Brighouse, Yorks., provisionally referred to this species, the regularly uniform length and position of a short internode at the commencement of each period of uniformly longer internodes are specially marked. In the first case no other figure illustrates the hollow pith in Calamites so well, and in the second case the uniform length of the internodes is interesting.

As a result of a study of this specimen and of a comparison made between it and specimens of the recent species of Equisetum, it is found that there is a strong resemblance between the two groups, Calamariæ and Equisetaceæ, in the position of the short internode, and a marked similarity in the uniform rate of increase or decrease in the length of the internodes in both groups also, most apparent in Calamitina, but probably in a modified form in Eucalamites and Styl calamites, and in subterranean stems of S. Suckowii there is a strict homology. The function in both extinct and recent groups was probably the same. It does not appear that similar observations have so far been made.

The following general conclusions have so far been arrived at from the investigation:—

(1) Position.—The short internode precedes a new period—i.e., is situated (a) at the base of the aerial stem, (b) between branchless and branch-bearing internodes, (c) before the strobilus or cone, or (d) in Calamariæ before a combination of (a) and (b).

(2) Function.—Its function appears to be to add strength to the stem by the occurrence of two girder-like nodes (with diaphragms) within a short distance of each other, thus serving the purpose of a double girder.

Equisetum is regarded as a degenerate form derived from the Calamariæ through Equisetites.

The second paper was by Mr. H. O. S. Gibson, B.A., on the Cephalochorda—"Amphioxides"—of the Sealark Expedition, and was communicated by Mr. J. Stanley Gardiner, F.R.S., F.L.S.

Prof. Dendy and Mr. H. W. Monckton, V.P., put some questions, to which the author replied.

The last paper, by Prof. J. Arthur Thomson, on the Alcyonaria of the Sealark Expedition, was also communicated by Mr. J. Stanley Gardiner, and in the absence of the author was read in the title.

CORRESPONDENCE

A NEGLECTED COMMA.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—A few days ago, whilst enjoying the reading of an article in a critical half-crown quarterly review, I came across the following sentence, which I had to read twice before I could grasp the full meaning of its first paragraph:

"To possess a literature purely its own a country must be independent politically, and it must have a language peculiar to it."

The pause I had to make somewhat disappointed me as a linguist fond of clear prose, and also because the chief beauty of the style of the author in question is precisely what I admire most in literary productions—namely, "clearness." I then tried to find out the reason for what I shall call the exceptional want of clearness in that author's style. It was, to my mind, owing to the absence of a comma between own and a country.

This incident reminded me of a sentence which I read, years ago, in one of Susan Warner's works:

"She would shrink from a stranger's eye, and yet when spoken to her answers were as ready and acute as they were marked for simplicity and gentleness."

When I had read it the first time, it had no meaning at all. "When spoken to her answers," etc.; I was not happier at the second reading: "When spoken to her," etc.; I attempted the reading of the sentence a third time, and by putting the "neglected comma" after "when spoken to," I could at last understand its full meaning.

From that moment, I have many a time wondered why the majority of English writers make it a point to discard the comma in similar cases. Would it be ungrammatical if they were to insert a comma after an adverb or an adverbial clause? Barnett is of opinion that it is a matter of taste. Nestfield is of the same opinion. Morell is entirely in favour of its use in "They that are drunken are drunken in the night," the adjunct "in the night" is not separated by a comma; but in the sentence, "In the night, the enemy stealthily approached," the adjunct is better marked off by a comma, as being an emphatic phrase (extract from Morell's Grammar).

The best French authors, from the seventeenth century to the present time, and also the best French modern journalists, etc., concur with Morell in this opinion:

Extraits d'auteurs du 17e au 20e siècle.

17e siècle.

Pendant que nous mangions, il a fait mettre la galère en mer, etc.

Molière (Les fourberies de Scapin).

17e—18e siècle.

Là, je trouve une croix de funeste présage, etc.

Boileau (Les Embarras de Paris).

18e siècle.

Quand le Khan de Tartarie a diné, un héraut crie que tous les princes de la terre peuvent aller dîner, etc.

Montesquieu (Lettres persanes).

Après l'exécution de la cantate, un chambellan lui fit une harangue de trois quarts d'heure, etc.

Voltaire (Zadig devenu ministre).

18e—19e siècle.

Une heure après le coucher du soleil, la lune se montra au-dessus des arbres à l'horizon opposé, etc.

Chateaubriand (Une nuit dans le Nouveau Monde).

19e siècle.

Dès onze ans, Mlle. Necker composait des portraits, etc. Sainte-Beuve (Me. de Staël).

Lorsqu'on lui signifi cet arrêt, il répondit simplement: "Je vous trouve plaisants," etc.

Guy de Maupassant (Histoire d'un condamné à mort au royaume de Monaco).

20e siècle.

Hier soir, un violent incendie a éclaté à B.

(Le Petit Parisien).

I can even add that this pause, after the adjunct, gives some grace to a speech. The English orators, whom I have hitherto heard in London, generally stopped for a second or two after the adverbial phrase; and this, to my French turn of mind, seemed to give more charm to their diction. Now, if they think that a pause is necessary after the adjunct, in their speeches, why do they not indicate that pause, in writing, by means of a comma?

I make bold to say that, in course of time, the neglected comma shall claim its right. I beg to be allowed to make use, here, of the "prophetic" future. My reason for doing so is this, because in the best written books and in the newspapers of high repute, now and then the neglected comma creeps into the place which diction has already assigned to it. Amongst my notes, I have over a score of examples that can bear out this statement. However, in order not to trespass too much on my readers' time and attention, I beg to quote only two cases in point.

(Extract from Leslie Stephens's "Memoir of J. D. Campbell," in one of the pages of the preface of the book):—

"After reaching Mauritius" (with the comma), "Campbell made a trip to Bombay in 1866. On his return" (without the comma) "he found the island suffering from an outbreak of malarial fever," etc.

(Extracts from the Weekly Times and Echo, November 6, 1904, first page):—

(a) "On September 9th" (without the comma) "the Japanese mines reached to within fifty metres of Kuropatkin fort," etc.

(b) "On the 28th" (without the comma) "the Japanese bombed the Russian fleet," etc.

(c) "On the 18th" (with the comma), "Russian prisoners said that the fate of Port Arthur was near at hand," etc.

A FRENCH LINGUIST.

GEORGE MEREDITH'S "GENIUS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—That the author of the "Ordeal of Richard Feverel" was, in degree, "a man of genius" goes without saying. Yet that he was an actual genius in a broad sense is not to be so readily granted. For seldom was there an author of fiction of any note who wrote in a more confused and enigmatic style and fashion than did George Meredith. Take, for example, "The Egoist," than which I do not scruple to affirm never was there perpetrated in the name of "literature" a more chaotic production outside the portals of a madhouse. Nevertheless, the recently deceased and lamented novelist was a gifted and accomplished writer, even though a vastly over-estimated one. But such genius as he had was best manifested in his poetical productions, and presumably in his "Pastorals"; for these were, indeed, beautiful, and never, perhaps, did so misunderstanding and "misunderstood" an author indulge in loftier and sweeter poesy than did George Meredith when under the spell of Nature. But that is not to say that he displayed even then transcendent genius; since he lacked the versatility and comprehensiveness of the heaven-born and universal genius, his lays were sweet, his metre harmonious, his allegory delightful, and his metaphors and symbolical blendings most admirable; but he held not the "key" to the human heart, and could never do better than tickle and captivate the intellectual fancy, for his sympathies were contracted and his temperament was uncongenial.

Consequently his Pegasus was a halting jade, and, save only when in green pastures and flowery meadows, could never be induced to canter freely and gladly. For Mr. Meredith's was a brooding and foreboding nature and mentality; his ego was too pronounced, and yet narrow, to permit of wide-reaching or of broad human sympathy. He could never shake off completely his obsessing ego, or, like Dickens, Thackeray, and other great Victorian masters of fiction, lose himself entirely in the characters of his creation and depiction. And therein, I think, consists the gist of my contention, to the effect that he was in no true sense a man of genius of the highest order. For if (as who shall gainsay?) genius is exceptional capacity to shed light and to fathom the remotest depths of human nature (as distinguishable in literary genius) then George Meredith was not a genius in the fullest sense; since in nothing he ever wrote in prose, with the exception perhaps of the "Ordeal of Richard Feverel," did he display any evidence of such capacity. Indeed, so dark and obscure was he in his novels generally that none but professed "mind readers" or devotees to the occult could pretend to "interpret" his actual meaning, or to proclaim his precise "gospel!" In other words, were we to accredit him with any deep and earnest desire and purpose to serve mankind and to impart light of any kind on the problems of the human soul and of life we should look in vain for any evidences of the same in his prose works; for not even in the "Ordeal of Richard Feverel" do we observe anything better than admirable diction, biting sarcasm, graceful portrayals, and mournful pessimism, even though he did evince unwonted capacity in a single instance of a distinctively creative nature, as in his depiction of the scene in which his "hero" appeared in a veritable human and pathetic attitude! Moreover, Mr. Meredith was not a bit more fortunate in his public character, or as an authority on social and public questions, than as an author of fiction. For while as an author he had evidently no didactic purpose, so as a private individual and a social unit he would not appear to have been actuated by any definite and exalted motives; and so far from ever having proffered his services and efforts to the cause of humanity, or to the correction of abuses and errors, he rather added to than ameliorated the scene of human confusion, as, for instance, in his astounding comments upon the marriage question! Yet, in spite of everything, Mr. Meredith was an excellent poet; and such genius as he had found its happiest vent in his "Pastorals," the most graceful, melodious, and delightful bursts of genuine poesy, eclipsed only by Tennyson and Wordsworth in the Victorian epoch.

But whereas Wordsworth and Tennyson devoted their genius to humanity, and their mission and "gospel" were obvious to all men, it would not appear that Meredith had any mission or gospel at all! Yet he ever wrote, as a prose author at all events, as though he thought he had some kind of a "message" to deliver!

Unfortunately, however, he was plainly more concerned about the manner of delivery of his "message" than about its actual delivery. At all events, he never did deliver anything of the kind! In song alone did he excel, and then only when under the spell of Nature, or in his "Pastorals." So beautiful, however, were these that the memory of their author should be respected by all lovers of English verse.

EDWIN RIDLEY.

ENGLISH HISTORY THROUGH AMERICAN GLASSES.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—We have had in recent years English history from the States that has made our accepted British historians sit up. Not long ago Mrs. Gallup informed us—per her cypher—that Francis Bacon and the Earl of Essex were the sons of Queen Elizabeth and the Earl of Leicester!

The latest Yankee exponent of English history is Mr. Price Collier, who has published a book in London entitled "England and the English from an American Point of View."

In his chapter "Who are the English?" we are informed by Mr. Collier, "No man cares a fig what a man's ancestry was in this matter-of-fact land [i.e., Britain] if he succeeds, if he becomes rich and powerful." Then he gives two concrete examples of what he means:

(i) "The mother of the great Queen Elizabeth was the daughter of a plain English gentleman."

The mother of Queen Elizabeth was nothing of the kind. Queen Elizabeth's mother was Anne Boleyn, and so far was Anne's mother, also Elizabeth, from being "the daughter of a plain English gentleman," she was the daughter of Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey, who, for his services in defeating the Scots at Flodden, was afterwards made Duke of Norfolk. She married Sir Thomas Boleyn, afterwards Earl of Wiltshire, and their daughter was Anne Boleyn, the mother of Queen Elizabeth.

(2) The other example of English history is the following:— "A pot-girl of Westminster married the master of a pot-house. After his death she consulted a lawyer named Hyde. Mr. Hyde married her. Mr. Hyde afterward became Lord Chancellor with the title of Lord Clarendon, and his wife, the former pot-girl, bore him a daughter. This daughter married the Duke of York, and became the mother of Mary and Anne Stewart, both afterward Queens of England." Then Mr. Collier makes the sapient comment: "It is evident that if Queens of England may have a barmaid for grandmother lesser mortals need not fret on the subject of ancestry."

Unfortunately for this American importer of English history the grandmother of the two Queens was never a "barmaid," or "pot-girl," as he calls her, never married "the master of a pot-house," and was not a widow when she married Edward Hyde. She, Frances, was the only daughter, and sole heiress (after her brother's death), of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Bart., who had been Secretary to George, Duke of Buckingham, and was afterwards Master of Bequests and Master of the Mint. She was carefully brought up by her father at his seat, Cranbourne Lodge, Windsor Park; and it is safe to say that she never saw the interior of a "pot-house." At least there is no trace of such introduction to low life in Clarendon's "Autobiography," Lister's authoritative "Life," Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors," or "The Dictionary of National Biography." There is a letter extant to Hyde's father from Sir Thomas congratulating him on the marriage—young Hyde was only a struggling barrister at the time—and stating that he gave the youth his daughter, describing her as "a child that none could have had from me but a good man." The couple spent a long and happy life together, Lady Hyde on her death being buried in Westminster Abbey, and her husband dying in exile at Rouen.

It will be interesting to learn Mr. Collier's authority for the statement that Frances Aylesbury was ever a "pot-girl."

Mr. Collier shows his further knowledge of English history when, on the next page, he speaks of "down to the commencement of the reign of Charles the Second, 1649"; and again when he includes among the "Peers who have taken their places among the peers by force of long purses gained in trade" the name of Lord Lister.

Mr. Collier's powers of observation are on a par with his knowledge of British history when he writes, among his "First Impressions" of England, the following dictum:—"The complexities of the English have often been exploited for our benefit. The damp climate and the exercise out-of-doors produce the red, they say. But on examination it proves to be not the red of the rose, but the red of raw beef, and often streaky and fibrous at that. The features are large and the faces high-coloured, but it is not a delicate pink, it is a coarse red. . . . Here the features of the women, even the features of the beautiful women, are moulded; while the features of our beautiful women are chiselled."

This is possibly the reason they prove so attractive to the British nobility! Mr. Collier, apparently, was never at an Ascot meeting, however.

GEORGE STRONACH.

FLAUBERT AND ST. GERTRUDE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—One should be apologetic, I suppose, in this age of "common-sense" in speaking of such things as tutelary guardians and the like. Still, even in these most modern of days one's fancy will roam, one's heart will rally with things mediæval, sometimes, indeed, with quite a feeling of kinship! For instance, one might think of this or that saint of old, might come across in the record of their lives this or that which suddenly stirs one with quite a sense of fellowship. And if one forgot one's modernity one might even find oneself turn to them as one would in life, craving for a kindly hand, sure of an instinctive sympathy. And if one fancied this for oneself one might fancy it for others. Hence the thought that brought to mind the two names—Flaubert and St. Gertrude.

Two books are open before me as I write—"The Life and Revelations of St. Gertrude" and a book of essays, by Henry James. The latter is open at the essay of Gustave Flaubert. I read: "His life was that of a pearl-diver, breathless in the thick element while he groped for the priceless word. . . ." Thus Flaubert, with his life-long, soul-absorbing search for the one word, the inevitable word, the Eros to his unwedded, expectant idea.

And I turn over the pages of the "Revelations" and surely the same vivid sense of some intimate, indissoluble correlation of word and idea! Not, indeed, as in Flaubert, revealing itself as a search, as the endeavour to establish such correspondences. In St. Gertrude this vivid sense of union of word and thought reveals itself as some sudden rapturous apprehension of the thought when the word is presented—as though indeed the word came to her with same fullness of sacramental grace. The word is uttered, and the soul of St. Gertrude is uplifted—the vision comes. ("For on the second Sunday, as they sang Mass, before the procession, the response which commences Vidi Dominum Facie ad Faciem, a marvellous and inestimable consecration illuminated my soul with the light of Divine revelation, and it appeared to me that my face was pressed to another face. . . .") How refreshing to the soul of Flaubert might have been the thought of such instinctive veneration for the "priceless word, during the wearisome, disheartening toil of his forty years at the battered table at Croisset." And had he thought of tutelary guardian, whither more fittingly could have been turned "bent head and beseeching hands!" I turn over page after page of these "Revelations of St. Gertrude," and page after page shows the same almost unique exquisite appreciation of the word, this instant coming of the "vision" at the sound of the "priceless word." And the toil of Flaubert seems justified. I say of Flaubert, but I mean of all others who enrich us that way. St. Gertrude's is a name that might be spoken softly by lovers of fit words—a tutelary guardian, perhaps, were not such things out of date.

T. W. COLE.

BURNS'S POEMS FOR GERMAN STUDENTS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—When a Burns editor can ask a casual commentator on his work what he means by the poet's "pride of place," he practically makes further discussion hopeless. A few final words, however, seem to be imperative. It will be noticed, to begin with, that this is not the first time a complaint has been made regarding the treatment accorded the Scottish bard by the conjoint editors. "Mr. Henley," says Mr. Henderson, "was more than surprised at the accusation that he was endeavouring to depreciate Burns." Apparently his own feeling now may be similarly described; he, too, throughout his communication shows that he is considerably "more than surprised." In his preliminary observations he makes one unwarrantable inference, for it was not suggested in the contribution he discusses that either Mr. Henley or himself cherished what he is pleased to call "a spite of Burns." It is open to his readers to say that he and his collaborator thought, and that he still thinks, the poet over-rated, and that they, together, and he at his own hand, decided to see whether or not it were possible to give him his true position in the poetical ranks. If such was the attitude, taken in unison and separately, it was perfectly legitimate, but Mr. Henderson need not expect that either the combined performance or his own individual experiment should command universal assent. He either misapprehends or he quaintly misinterprets the remarks offered here on the illustrations he advances towards proving Burns's peasant origin. What was said was that members of the aristocracy might have seen and heard (not necessarily put into poetical form) what he reports of the poet, and that therefore the evidence of peasantry is not manifested in the examples chosen. One illustration may suffice: Mr. Henderson says that Burns's line, "The silent moon shone high o'er tower and tree," proclaims "his peasant mastery of Nature's idiosyncrasies." Such being his contention, it would be interesting to know how he would place the nobleman who wrote "Don Juan" for his touch about the moonlight "hallowing tree and tower." Manifestly in his application of philosophical analysis Mr. Henderson leaves something to be desired.

"The glossary," says Mr. Henderson, "is succinct"; and he ought to see that it was this very quality of succinctness that prompted the comments on his stimulating entry "be, alone." Here he endeavours to explain a sound example of English phraseology in a manner that very conceivably leads to the large and bewildering issues already indicated. It is also because he is too succinct that he fails to be clear in defining "bracken," "braik," "cheep," "hallan," and other terms that might be specified. With regard to "cheep" in particular, he ought surely to have said that "chirp" as well as "peep" is an equivalent, if only to guard against imminent ambiguity. He declares himself satisfied with his interpretation of "sumple," thus inferentially declining the information proffered as to the word and the character it connotes. On this point Allan Ramsay might be profitably consulted.

SCRUTATOR.

NOTES ON SHAKESPEARE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Among sundry compositor's changes in my letter of last week is the substitution of "us" for "as" in the last line, which effectually obscures my meaning.

The word "subscribe," to which I was referring, has many related significations in Shakespeare's works. They may, I think, be classed as follows:—

- (1) To authenticate by signature, "Write to him (I will subscribe) tender adieu" (Ant. and Cleop., IV. 5).
- (2) To enter names for any purpose in a document, "Blank charters, Whereto, when they shall know what men are rich, They shall subscribe them for large sums of gold" (K. Rich. II. 1. 4).
- (3) To explicate or set forth, "When I had subscribed To mine own fortune" (All's Well, V. 3).
- (4) To be surety or to answer for anyone, "To the possibility of thy soldiery, [I] will subscribe for thee" (All's Well, III. 6).—"I will subscribe for thee; thou art both knave and fool" (Ib., IV. 5).
- (5) To act as a substitute or champion, "My uncle's fool, reading the challenge, subscribed for Cupid" (Much Ado, I. 1).
- (6) To give assent to, "To your pleasure humbly I subscribe" (Tam. Shrew, I. 1).—"Advise thee, Aaron, what is to be done, And we will all subscribe to thy advice" (Tit. Andr., IV. 2).—"Will you subscribe his thought, and say he is?" (Troil. and Cress., II. 3).
- (7) To be influenced by or be indulgent towards, "For Hector, in his blaze of wrath, subscribes To tender objects" (Troil. and Cress., IV. 5).
- (8) To acknowledge or suffer defeat or yield precedence, "If I have fewest [roses], I subscribe in silence" (K. Hen. VI., II. 4).—"Death to me subscribes, Since, spite of him, I'll live in this poor rhyme" (Sonnet CVII.).
- (9) To admit an error or retract an opinion, "Which fear if better reasons can supplant, I will subscribe, and say I wronged the duke" (K. Hen. VI., III. 1).

FRANCIS H. BUTLER.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "COYOTE."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—The best account of this word is to be found in the great Oxford dictionary, the editor of the "Q" part being Mr. W. A. Craigie. From this article we may see that the word "coyotes" is mentioned in a list of games in an Act passed in the reign of Richard II., and that "coyte" occurs in the Promptorium (A.D. 1440) in the sense of a flat disc of stone or metal thrown as an exercise of strength or skill. Mr. Craigie, cautious man, contents himself with saying that the word is of obscure etymology. In the current ACADEMY a correspondent boldly equates this fourteenth century "coyte" with a Scandinavian word "kvitt," used for a coin of the value of the third part of a Danish skilling. Let us examine this word "kvitt" a little more closely. Originally it meant a "white" or silver coin. From Aasen's Norwegian dialect dictionary we learn that "kvitt" is equivalent to the Danish "hvid," which in Larsen's dictionary is explained "doit, $\frac{1}{3}$ of a Dan. Skilling." Both the Norwegian and the Danish forms are derived from the old Norse hvitr (white), cp. Norw. dial. kvit, Dan. hvid, O.E. hwit, Eng. white. Now, your correspondent actually affirms that a Scandinavian word, which in the fourteenth century was pronounced like O.E. hwit (in Prompt. whyte), is identical with a Prompt. form written coyte. I think it must be admitted that even the French derivation mentioned by Mr. Craigie is a more probable one than the Scandinavian one suggested in this week's ACADEMY.

OLD FRIENDS OF MR. LE QUEUX.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I am much interested in the correspondence in your columns regarding my friends, and I am glad to see that they are also of interest to the public.

In reply to the query of your correspondent "O. K."—who has apparently never handled pearls of great price—the pearls in question were heirlooms of the Royal house of Saxony, and if your correspondent is so interested in them, I shall be delighted to furnish him with the name of the bank and that of my "old friend" its manager, who will bear out my statement that I not only introduced to him a certain Royal lady, but I later on handed him the order to deliver over to me the pearls in question to convey to the Continent!

SHADOWS

By FRANCIS GRIERSON

Author of "The Celtic Temperament" and "Modern Mysticism." Demy 8vo, 6/- net.!

"Of the author's literature there can be no doubt, for Mr. Grierson is emphatically what Henley would have called a writer."—The Manchester Guardian.

"Maurice Maeterlinck has said of Mr. Grierson that he writes what others would have dreamed of writing. But the secret of his art lies not only in courage and frankness to set down his memories, but in the quality of the memories themselves, the distinction of the language in which they are embodied."—Glasgow Herald.

"In THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS," says the London Times, "Mr. Francis Grierson appears in a different rôle from that of essayist, in which he was so successful; he recalls in vivid memories the wonderful romance of his life in Lincoln's country before the war, letting the political, social and religious characters speak for themselves."

"It is a wonderful picture, rich in the lights and shadows of American society before the Civil War. Mr. Grierson writes with enviable literary skill . . . the book from the first page to the last is quick with human emotion and the power causing the vanished past to spring suddenly into new life."—The Standard.

"Francis Grierson has had a marvellous career which is a romance in itself."—Morning Post.

"Told with wonderful charm . . . enthralling as any romance . . . truth, though often stranger than fiction, is almost always duller; Mr. Grierson has accomplished the rare feat of making it more interesting. There are chapters in the book—'The Camp Meeting' is an example of one kind, 'The Log House' of another—that haunt one afterwards like remembered music, or like passages in the prose of Walter Pater."—Punch.

The novel cannot fail to entrance all who read it.

(2) THE DIAMOND AND THE ROSE

It is a book that everyone should read and recommend; it is at times comic, dramatic, and sensational.

(3) A SHOOTING STAR

By EFFIE CHAMBERLAYNE.
A novel in which a spice of politics is ingeniously interwoven with a charming love story.

By the Author of "The Log of a Sailorman."

(4) OVER BRAVE BLUE SEAS

By WILL BROOKE. [Shortly].
In his new work Mr. Will Brooke presents a realistic account of a sailor's life; his wanderings and adventures by land and sea from the time of his first voyage in a sailing vessel until he obtains command of an ocean-going steamship. The toil, the strife, the humour and pathos of life on the great waters are depicted in intensely vivid and striking language. A sailor by profession, Mr. Brooke has gifts of insight, imagination, observation and description that are usually associated only with the born storyteller.

PRICE THREEPENCE

"SCORPIO." By J. A. CHALONER

" . . . He prides himself on the fact that he is a hard and terrible biter. Indeed, he assures us that he has come to the conclusion that you can put a wicked man 'to sleep' with a sonnet in pretty much the same way that a prize-fighter puts his opponent to sleep with a finished blow. And not only does Mr. Chaloner believe in what we may term the sonnetorial fist, but he believes also in whips and scorpions, for the cover of his book is decorated with an angry-looking seven-thonged scourge, and he dubs the whole effort 'Scorpio.' So that when we look to the fair page itself we know what to expect. Not are we disappointed. Mr. Chaloner goes to the opera. Being a good poet, he immediately writes a sonnet about it, the which, however, he calls 'The Devil's Horsehoe.' We reproduce it for the benefit of all whom it may concern—

'A lucid sight for a philosopher—
Rich as Golconda's mine in lessons rare—
That gem-bedizen'd "horse-shoe" at th' Opera,
Replete with costly bags and matrons fair!
His votaries doth Mammon there array,
His Amazonian Phalanx dread to face!

Figuratively speaking, we (Palmetto Press) might add that Mr. Chaloner steps forward as the champion of Shakespeare's memory, and lands, with the force of a John L. Sullivan, upon the point of the jaw of Mr. G. B. SHAW, owing to the latter's impertinent comments upon Shakespeare.

(Delivered, post-paid on receipt of two dollars, by registered mail, to PALMETTO PRESS, ROANOKE RAPIDS, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A.)

To Mammon there do they their homage pay;
Spang'd with jewels, satins, silks and lace,
Crones whose old bosoms in their corsets creak;
Beldames whose slightest glance would fright a horse;
Ghouls—when they speak one hears the grave-mole squeak—
Their escorts parvenus of feature coarse.
A rich array of Luxury and Vice!
But, spite of them, the music's very nice."

"Here you have whips, scorpions, and a knock-out blow with a vengeance. The sonnet as a whole is not one which we can approve from a technical or a sentimental point of view, but it has points. Henley might have plumed himself on that line about the creaking corsets, and the last line, a tour de force, in its way reminds us of the withering ironies of Byron. It is only fair to Mr. Chaloner to add that not all his sonnets are concerned with back-biting. . . . Some of them show the tenderer emotions proper to a poet. We like him best, however, in his character as metrical bruiser. . . . His book is well worth possessing."—The Academy, August 8th, 1906.

LIFE AND LETTERS

ALTHOUGH as a rule we do not print the "puffs" which the publishers continually send to us under the heading of "literary intelligence," we feel that we must make an exception in the case of the following beautiful piece of writing which "emanates" from "the great house of Murray":

"The Earl of Rosebury (sic) has written an interesting preface to the 'Recollections of a Long Life,' by John Cam Hobhouse, afterwards Lord Broughton, which Mr. Murray is publishing next week. Hobhouse, as the reading-world well knows, was one of the most loyal of Byron's many friends, and tells in these revealing volumes a great deal which lovers of the poet (sic) will be glad to know."

We think that the great house of Murray might, with advantage, look out for a typewriting clerk whose admiration for the "poet" has not been cultivated to the extent of interfering with his grounding in "the three R's." But possibly "our Mr. Farquharson," who is presumably responsible for the wording of the guileless circulars with which Mr. Murray kindly favours us from time to time, does his own typewriting, and does not consider such a trifle as spelling worthy of his notice.

We are glad to see among the names of the Liberal members who are protesting against the Budget those of Sir Edward Tennant and Sir John Dickson-Poynder. As we have previously pointed out in these columns, it is men of this type who really stand for the Liberal opinion of the country. Your Lloyd Georges, your Winston Churchills and your Asquiths no more represent Liberalism than the Suffragists represent English womanhood. Claptrap and carpet-bagging may be made to look very beautiful by artists at the game; but sooner or later they are bound to come to grief. The Government now in power has been a Government of insincerities from the day of its formation. Liberals have put up with it because it went into power in the name of Liberalism. That it has since devoted itself to a fine exposition of the principles of Socialism, and even of anarchy, is not the fault of Liberalism. A good Liberal is no more likely to swallow the Budget proposals of David the Roost-Robber than is a good Tory. When it comes to open and unblushing confiscation party considerations must give way to considerations of natural justice. It is highly creditable to the gentlemen we have named and to their following that they should make a stand against their popularity-hunting leaders. We miss the name of Mr. Ivor Guest from the combination, and we are a little sorry to see that the name of Sir Edward Grey is also missing. But probably both Mr. Guest and Sir Edward Grey are there in the spirit. If Liberalism is to be saved it will not be saved by the shouters and the distributors of other people's goods, but by the men who stand for principle as opposed to opportunism, and the broadening down of freedom as opposed to jumpiness and revolution.

Mr. Justice Darling has published a new book of verses under the title of "On the Oxford Circuit." The book is being described by the reviewers as "scholarly," "instinct with poetical feeling," and so forth. We shall prefer our indictment against it in a future issue. Meanwhile, here is a small extract from the title poem:

This that the Judge is to come—the Red Judge—to hold the assizes;
Liberty bringing to some—but to other surcease from life's labour—
Hard labour—delight of the good—awarding the bad to chastise them.
He comes to attribute restraints—and, haply, with that reformation—
For ordered revenge of the Law holdeth balm for the wound of the wronged one;
Yet causeth maleficients pain—yea, dolour impelling to virtue;
That virtue sufficing for joy in sense 'tis enough to deserve well.
So shall the best remain good, while the worst become possibly better;
Each rascal receiving his due—the cell, or the scourge, or the gallows;
Pleasant to righteousness' taste the pain a transgressor must suffer;
None taking more than his share, yet each a fair portion receiving.

This is no doubt very scholarly, in so far as it may be considered an adventure with hexameters; and from the point of view of the Daily Mail it may also be "instinct with poetry." But we must say frankly that in our opinion a judge at King's Bench should not publish such stuff. Flippancy about the law from the administrators of the law is not engaging. Of course, it seems to us highly probable that Mr. Justice Darling wrote the lines we have quoted long before he attained to what are known as "judicial honours." And as some men find it difficult to write anything like passable hexameters every day of their lives, Mr. Justice Darling may in a sense be excused. On the other hand, we wish that he had refrained.

Side by side with Sir Charles Darling we shall also arraign next week a Mr. Figgis, who has published a book of verses called "A Vision of Life," and a Mr. G. K. Chesterton, who has puffed Mr. Figgis. Mr. Chesterton, of course, will be there as an accessory before the fact. Mr. Figgis writes about babies under the head of "Multum in Parvo," and to the following effect:

Baby-feet,
Scarce distinguishable forms,
Must they foot amid Life's storms
Lonely; none to soothe its qualms,
None to weet?

Baby-face,
Shall it wear the print of Time,
Woven o'er with hoary rime:
Or shall death in sunnier clime
Pallor trace?

Mr. Chesterton says: "I will not deny that much of my pleasure in Mr. Figgis's work arises from a sympathy with his serious and sincere enjoyment of beauty and the great things that life begets."

The inspired Mr. George Bernard Shaw has been called in by the equally inspired Dr. Robertson Nicoll to give us views about Algernon Charles Swinburne. Here is Shaw:

"Swinburne needed a literary inspiration: he was really always a paraphraser, and he could rise to the ideas of the author he was paraphrasing with a power quite astonishing in a man who could not rise to the life and action round him at all, and who apparently passed by natural objects without seeing them—even those natural objects of which he had paraphrased descriptions again and again. He was a splendid sounding-board, vibrating grandly to other people's conceptions; and if he had spent his life in turning Greek thought into English music he would have enriched the nation enormously. As it was, he has left us nothing but a wonderful garment of words that clothed very little of himself. His prose, with its mechanical alliterations and its continual substitution of a violent superlative qualified by an 'all but' or a 'well nigh' for the right word which he never could find, is villainous in style and often not much better in temper; but his disregard for other people's feelings and his recluse's freedom from the social influences and superstitions which muzzle the rest of us even more than our timidity and good-nature enabled him to say many things that other critics would not say. He was never stupid exactly; but he often produced an impression of disloyalty by the transition from the splendour and vigour of his echoes of revolutionary writers to the conventionality of his own views, which were made in Putney. . . . One sometimes asks whether anybody but a very dull man could have swallowed the Elizabethan dramatists so indiscriminately as he, or whether he would have swallowed them at all if he had never read Lamb. . . . Always distinguishing and powerful at second hand, always commonplace and futile at first hand; great on paper, insignificant on Putney Hill."

Some day possibly somebody will be writing of somebody else: "always undistinguished and without dignity; always prancing and posturing and becking for the smiles of the half-witted; great in Battersea and Bayswater, insignificant in the Adelphi."

It seems that we have a poet amongst us who is a Member of Parliament. His name is J. Fitzalan Hope, and on Wednesday evening he recited to an amazed and tittering House the appended lines:

This is a tax on the increment value
One-fifth of which pay most certainly shall you
When the kind London gentlemen tell you how much
Is the difference of price they decide to be such
You might have got and might get from some sanguine fool
(But don't get at all in plain fact as a rule)
On a few chosen acres; meanwhile on the rest
With a decrement interest compound you are blest,
And, mind you, your house to the ground you must raze,
Your cellars fill up and your sheds set ablaze;
Your pipes you must block, and your timber must fell,
Your fruit bushes grub up and your cabbage as well,
And the lawns that proclaim your most exquisite taste,
You must forthwith reduce to a site value waste.

Then when all's a fair prairie, suburban I trow,
For the cost of destruction they'll something allow.
Thus the work goes on gaily, the owner may groan,
But the Chancellor resumes what was never his own.
On the whole the House of Commons would appear To be in a very bad way just now. Speeches in verse —and such verse—offer food for the gravest reflection.

Not to be outdone in this regard, Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggin—Litt.D., if you please—has been addressing the Authors' Society metrically, and in this wise:

Mr. Chairman, good friends, fellow authors at table,
I fear I shall find myself not very able To deal with that difficult subject "The Guests";
Still, one cannot evade Dr. Gosse's behests.
If only he'd said: "Talk of 'Palates of Snails,'
'The Uses of Radium,' 'Women in Jails,'
'Revisions of Tariff' or 'Copyright Laws,'
'The Prospects of Holland' or 'Rumours of Wars,'"

You can "read up" such topics in encyclopædias;
You're sure of your facts, if you're frequently tedious!

Everybody will admire such rhymes as "laws" and "wars," not to say "encyclopædias" and "tedious," especially from a full-blown female Litt.D. Further on, however, Mrs. Wiggin outwiggined Mrs. Wiggin by remarking sublimely:

Yet though we meet often the Homer who "nods,"
We must still pour libations to gods and half gods—
Those who smile, grave, serene, from the heights of Olympus,
And smaller ones, somewhat addicted to simpers!
We must bow to a genius whenever we see one.

For our own part we agree and bow. That it should be possible for a society of authors in England, of which George Meredith was president, solemnly to listen to such doggerel, even after dinner, is almost beyond belief. We hope in the interests of all parties that Mrs. Wiggin's Litt.D. is an American affair.

Having discovered that its protestations of Christian charity towards persons who wish to take the Communion without being confirmed are not popular among sensible churchmen, the Spectator has returned to its old silly season enquiry: "Do Animals Reason?"
In last Saturday's issue of Mr. Strachey's excellent journal we are treated to the ancient story of a dog who possesses a conscience; and, of course, he is trotted out as if he were the marvel of the age. In point of fact, most dogs have had consciences this several years back, and so have other animals. If Mr.
Strachey really wishes to know whether animals reason he might visit the Palace Theatre, where he will find on show every evening a middle-sized ape, who can do everything except edit the Spectator.

The birthday honours, as usual, must have come upon certain people with something of a shock. There are no new peers, Mr. Pearson being still out in the cold, and none of the Harmsworths has been made a Duke. We weep; but we are not sorry. Art, science and letters, however, have been remembered with knighthoods. For example, Henry W. Lucy, Esquire, is to be known for the future as Sir Hennerly (no connection, of course, with Lloyd George); Arthur Wing Pinero, Esquire, is now Sir Arthur Wing Pinero; and, unkindest cut of all, Herbert Beerbohm Tree, Esquire, commonly known as Mr. Tree, must for the future be addressed as Sir Herbert. We had always believed that Mr. Tree was being reserved for a more substantial dignity. It is a little hard that he should be fobbed off with what he might himself describe as an ignominious knighthood. However, we congratulate all partes concerned, and we do not suppose for a moment that Mr. Tree will worry. As for Mr. Lucy, we can only say that he is sure to be as pleased as Punch. And as for Pinero, we shall expect from him a rousing play on the subject.

Dr. Robertson Nicoll really must be careful. It appears that Mr. Justice Darling proposed the toast of "Literature" at the Associated Booksellers' dinner. Dr. Robertson Nicoll was present, and he writes of the Hon. Mr. Justice Darling as follows:

"To me, the surprise of the evening was the speech of Mr. Justice Darling, who proposed the toast of 'Literature.' I had never seen Mr. Darling, but had read many of his jokes in the papers, and, like most people, had formed an opinion of him. But we found him on Saturday night both clever and humorous. He is a spare little man with a parboiled look. The eyes are lustreless, and the speaker never smiles at his own jests. But he got out some pretty fair ones."

How grateful "Mr. Darling" will be! And Dr. Nicoll concludes his report of the proceedings with the following beautiful words:

"Among the most observed of the guests was Mr. Humphry Ward, whose strong, handsome, Jewish face would draw attention anywhere." Surely the worthy author of "Sunday Afternoon Verses" is forgetting his manners!

We are afraid that our readers, like ourselves, must be beginning to get tired of the constant references in these columns to Mr. Frank Harris and his remarkable freak journal, Vanity Fair. For our part we should be delighted if we never had occasion to mention his name again. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Harris's vagaries are so astounding that it is impossible to allow them to go altogether unnoticed. Mr. Harris is a gentleman who imagines himself to be, among a great many other things, an accomplished critic, and by dint of roaring out his conviction that this is the case he has succeeded in making people believe it. As a matter of fact, he has no critical faculty whatever. The surest proof of this is to be found in the quality of the poetry which he prints in Vanity Fair. But there are other spheres of criticism in which one would have expected that at least he would be able to avoid making an exhibition of himself. Here is what Mr. Harris has to say about Yvette Guilbert:

"We went the other night to see Yvette Guilbert, who is, of course, as extraordinary as ever in her French songs, and who, strange to say, was rapturously applauded by the house in her English songs as well, which we found a good deal of difficulty in understanding."

It is almost incredible that anyone can be found to talk such preposterous rubbish. Yvette Guilbert's rendering of her French songs is certainly beautiful and striking enough, but for sheer unadulterated beauty and accomplishment we have never heard anything to equal her rendering of the old English ballads, "The Keys of Heaven" and the "Gallant Man." Mr. Harris, of course, belongs to that school of critics who think it the height of discrimination to assert that everything is done better in France, a country with which they usually have a very meagre acquaintance.

We shall print next week an article entitled "High Poetry," which will be delicious reading for Mr. Spender and for all persons who love their sea-green, incorruptible Westminster.

THE TRAVELLERS

OfT I consider jocund Youth, with song
And merrimake upon the sunlit road;
And Age, bowed down beneath his heavy load,
To whom the sorrows of the world belong:
One in the beauty of a gracious prime,
Exulting to the music of desire;
The other glad once to have held the lyre,
And to have dwelt in seigniorage of Time.

Sojourners are they from a distant land,
Who have come long leagues across the hills of Morn;
With eager, infinite hearts I see them stand,
Listening in dimness to the heavenward lark:
They are drunk with joy, with loneliness forlorn,
And they go forth again into the dark.

THE CENSORSHIP AND COMMON-SENSE

ON the face of it, a body of poets seems scarcely an ideal organisation to debate upon so entirely unpoetic a matter as the dramatic censorship. To Mr. George Bernard Shaw, however—and quite properly, too, for that matter—any audience is better than no audience. The Poets' Club, accordingly, have just been "privileged" to hear Mr. Redford's latest "victim" hold forth in characteristic vein on the Censor and all his works. It is true that the gathering contained merely poetasters, instead of poets, and that only one dramatist, in the person of a young lady, was present; but the occasion was none the less an interesting one.

Mr. Bernard Shaw is never so happy as when he is talking about himself. At the Poets' Club last week he had a thoroughly congenial topic, and, as need scarcely be said, he did not fail to make the most of it. To Mr. Shaw, and those who agree with him, the sooner the Censor's head is served up on a charger the better. Nothing else, apparently, will satisfy him. Some of the dicta he laid down in support of his arguments strike people who do not happen to be distinguished dramatists a little curiously. One, for example, was "immorality is the very thing that is necessary to progress"; and another, "decency, in its essence, is not within the jurisdiction of the Censor at all"; while a third pronouncement was to the effect that a play should be produced first and licensed afterwards. These views are certainly somewhat startling. Fortunately, however, very few people are likely to take them seriously.

As with most matters to which he applies himself, so with this one of the dramatic censorship, Mr. Shaw sees only one side of the case. And he only sees this particular side from his own limited point of view. In all probability he quite honestly believes that no other exists. He has written a play and Mr. Redford, representing the Lord Chamberlain, representing the King, representing Tom, Dick and Harry, has banned it. Therefore the times are out of joint, and only Mr. Bernard Shaw can set them right. Such, briefly, are the premises on which is built up an elaborate argument for the abolition of the system under which plays are licensed at theatres controlled by the Lord Chamberlain. But, really, the argument scarcely holds water—much less anything more convincing. To begin with, there must be taken into consideration the extremely significant fact that the managers—who, after all, are concerned to a far greater degree than the dramatists—are practically unanimously in favour of retaining the censorship. The system is one which, on the whole, has been found to work smoothly, and the managers are, accordingly, quite content to let well alone. Besides, apart from this, the people who conduct theatres recognise that the censorship really acts as a protection to them. This is because once a play has been licensed they can produce it, secure in the knowledge that no crank or busybody can subsequently demand its suppression on the grounds of its impropriety. We must either have a censor or Scotland Yard, and Mr. Redford—despite his sins—is the lesser of the two evils. In America—"the Land of the Free"—theatrical managers have to deal with Mr. Comstock. This, no doubt, explains why Mr. Frohman spends most of his time in London.

Besides, what, after all, is the particular hardship in the exercise of the dramatic censorship? It is really difficult to see that there is one. Under the present regulations practically any play is licensed as a matter of course, so long as it is neither indecent, nor irreligious, nor politically offensive. Surely, nobody can reasonably object to this. If people insist on writing plays to which these disqualifications apply—well, they have no business to expect them to be licensed. Certainly the censorship has never been put in force against any play to which one or other of these disqualifications has not applied in greater or lesser degree. It is no argument for the abolition of the present system to say that objectionable plays have been licensed. Mr. Redford is only human, and a great deal slips through his net. The contention that plays should be produced first and licensed afterwards is unreasonable and absurd. Managers can scarcely be expected to go to the trouble and expense of producing a piece which they might be called upon to withdraw the next night at the instance of the police or a common informer. They prefer—and very wisely—to know beforehand just how far they can go. From the elegant extracts, and synopsis of the plot, relating to "The Showing-Up of Blanco Posnet," which Mr. Shaw has published, most people would have but little difficulty in deciding that Mr. Redford was quite right to ban it.

The real truth about the censorship is not that it is too strict, but that it is not nearly strict enough. At one time Paterfamilias used to send his wife to the theatre and go himself to the music-hall. Now he changes the tickets. He knows from experience which offers the more suitable form of entertainment. Nor is his decision remarkable when one reflects on the fare frequently set before patrons of the theatre nowadays. Quite a number of authors appear constitutionally unable to distinguish the obstetric from the dramatic. For example, one of the recently prohibited plays actually dealt with an illegal operation, and the illustrious author thinks himself very hardly treated because this choice masterpiece was vetoed. What on earth did he expect? Probably a pension from the Royal Literary Fund and the Order of Merit. What he did get, however, was a vast amount of misdirected sympathy and support from sycophantic nobodies who here saw an easy way of hoisting themselves into publicity. Of course, there have been cases when the censorship has pressed a little unfairly, for in the exercise of his responsible duties the present occupant of the office strains at a good many gnats. Still, he also swallows camels to a much greater extent than did some of his predecessors. English playwrights, too, may perhaps take comfort from the fact that, whatever their grievances, they are nothing to those under which Continental dramatists have laboured. Not so long ago, for example, it was a strict rule on the Austrian stage that no pair of lovers should retire from a scene unless accompanied by a chaperon. It is also recorded that Schiller's "Maid of Orleans" was originally refused a licence on the grounds that the title was "too frivolous"!

A point generally lost sight of or ignored when arguing this vexed question of the censorship is that the propriety of a play depends quite as much (if not more) on the acting than on the dialogue. On this account a censorship of acting is badly wanted. Thus, a musical comedy or a Palais Royal farce—although not perhaps the acme of refinement or literary grace—may be perfectly harmless in itself, but yet a most improper and salacious entertainment solely by reason of the way it is acted. Even "East Lynne" could be rendered indecent if the heroine and Little Willie gave their minds to the task. This is because on the stage visible effects always make a greater appeal than audible ones. When one goes to the theatre one remembers very little of what one has heard in comparison with what one has seen. Indeed, the average person, after witnessing a play, would find it difficult to quote six lines of the dialogue correctly; still—and unless bored to extinction by the performance—he could probably give a very fair account of the acting. But indecency must not be confused with vulgarity. There is a marked difference between the two. Where the drama is concerned a good working rule is for all practical purposes supplied by the etymological derivation of these respective terms. This shows that indecency comes from the French, and vulgarity from the Latin.

"THROUGH A GLASS, DARKLY"

In the corner of a certain western English county a hillside field, thick with buttercups, rises steeply into the summer air. Its sweet, solemn curve of gold, first and lowest against the dark green woods far down the valley, then a fringe backed by white, stately clouds, then soaring till it stands silhouetted against the faultless ethereal blue of the sky, is one of those half-divine, mystical things for which our poor human speech can furnish no adequate name. Stunned by the shock of such beauty, our usual modes of expression do not respond. Our lips are silent, our eyes are dimmed, the wings of thought are suddenly expanded to lift on the winds of dreamland. We are as travellers enchanted "who may not laugh or weep," who, wandering some difficult high road, in glare and dust and dismay, should see the cool green gloom of a forest by-path, and, turning aside in their weary walking, should find fairy-haunted dells and bowers, the home of faun and dryad and elfin woodmen, girdled with shadowy streams and softly resounding with the songs of happy birds. What use to them, the ordinary desultory phrases of pleasure or adoration? The intensest form of adoration is silence; the shallow rill makes more noise in its whirling eddies than the mighty, measured flood of the river. Before that sweep of golden flowers, swinging between woods and sky, the earthly horizon narrowed, the bonds of time and space were loosened, the place where our footsteps trod became suddenly holy ground. Was it merely the entrancement of form, of outline, which induced this miracle? Was it merely the call of the massed, rich colour that charmed our senses? Or did colour and shape combine to thrill the heart? Or with the glimpse of that radiant line did the apprehension of some far-spoken syllable enter our consciousness, some divine breath of a language which no mortal has yet learned? Inaudible to the physical ear, its words might consist as easily of visible signs as of a series of sounds, our usual conception of language, and its appeal might be to our subtle, spiritual sense, that "sense of the infinite" by which we maintain our relationship with things unseen. Such a word might be spoken when the dawn, like some wonderful bloom of heaven springing from the blackest ground of night, grows and unfolds its perfection in a single, silent hour. Such a word, faint and far, might be felt to have been uttered when from lofty mountain-tops the pale mist creeps down as though to veil some secret ceremony of angelic hosts; or when, bold and bare and grand, the crags rise in high fragrant summer noons from the purple garment of heather cast about their feet. The slightest things may bring a whisper of that outer, ineffable language; the laugh of a child, sudden and clear and fearless; the unexpected call of a name from beloved lips; the moon-path on the sea; the song of a drowsy bird; the salt ocean-breath blown across a garden of roses. The meaning of these signs has never been written, can never be wholly learned; we can but wait and listen and treasure each ecstasy as a gift from a land unseen, precious and imperishable. For the moment we are caught up and shown the kingdoms, not of earth, but the heavenly kingdoms, our mortal eyes being holden; we are breathless, wondering, worshipping at the feet of the eternal.

Man approaches the infinite, tries to place himself in appreciable relation with these vast, enchanted oceans which surround his little isle of consciousness, by various ways, and each way will have its own manifold deviations. Earth calls him with a voice that is not earthly:

He builds the soaring spires
That sing his soul in stone; of her he draws,
Though blind to her, by spelling at her laws,
Her purest fires.

The true artist, beholding the glory of the world in a woman's face, finds himself strangely elated by a glory as of the divine, shining through mortal eyes and revealed in curves of mortal flesh, and to those who see his finished portrait come moments of mystical communion, fleeting, delicate convictions, echoes as of music half-remembered, elusive adventures of the soul. His brother artist, no less true, beholding the glory of the world in a blossoming orchard, in grey evenings when the "dreamy, gloomy, friendly trees" stand listening for the last low sigh of twilight, in the dusky city streets, paints into his picture something more than the cloud of frail, pink petals, more than the dark, motionless woodland broken against the sunken fires of the west, more than the crowded houses and shops, and for him, also, "the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing." Even so another will set sail on the limitless sea to a wind laden with music, overflowing with harmonies, murmuring with song. Far below the horizon are the players, yet towards them he pursues his devious way, faltering often, but trimming his sails to right and left that the very breezes which baffle him may send his vessel slowly onward. To him music opens most widely the gate of the infinite. The poet finds in human language the cage by which his dreams, his imaginings, his desires, can be imprisoned, so we have the exquisite "Madonna Mia" of Swinburne singing itself into our hearts, the echoes of Browning's "By the Fireside" taking us unawares, or the purity and melody of Meredith's "Love in the Valley" haunting us in sudden summer hours. The door of the temple is unbarred—we have entered and heard beyond the symbols of written language, beyond the sound of the spoken, rhythmic word, the summoning voice from the holy of holies, whose veil no man till death may tear aside.

But the men who discover the vision are not all artists, poets, musicians. The poet is comrade with him who reads and thrills to the magical cadences, who yet may not possess the power to write; the musician, with him who listens and understands; the artist shares his dream with the man who sees that curve of golden flowers, that wondrous splendour of orchards in blossom-time, those brooding shapes at evening, that divine investiture of a woman's face and form, but who could never set the faintest intimation of these things on the blank canvas. It is no disgrace to hear the music one can never make, to see the beauty one can never interpret, to burn with another's poetic fire.

As plants turn toward the sun, so does the human soul seek the light of this mysterious realm wherefrom it may draw knowledge of things divine. Into the great vague ocean man lets fall his hopelessly trivial measuring lines of conscious thought and laboured reasoning, only to feel how little he can know, how far he has "come short of the glory." He has his dreams, his hours of passionate delight, his tranquil hours of patient thought, his secret experiences of the mind, when he seems to stand on the verge of countries lost to memory, of unfamiliar seas, whence come echoes from the conversations of the great gods:

Such as we hear in youth, and think the feeling
Will never die; yet, ere we are aware,
The feeling and the sound are fled and gone,
And the regret they leave remains alone.

Reasoning avails little when the mind attempts to solve by intellectual pertinacity problems which belong to the realm of intuition, of impermanent, whispered suggestions, of quiet, receptive pauses in life's harsh and headlong career. For by its explicit nature reason is forced to proceed on prescribed lines, to argue and deduce from past events; its chief duty is "to receive, arrange, register, and transmit the traditions which are the real substance of man's experience." The transient fantasy of some poet's imagination, the prayerful vision of some trembling saint, clasping a hand unseen, are more living and real and decisive than all the syllogisms of clever logicians when confronting these impalpable things of the spirit. Keen, with an almost dangerous keenness, is the soul for any testimony that can by any twisted possibility aid it in its ingrained task, for any light, fierce or gentle, that may shine down the tortuous labyrinth of fruitless days, any guide that may haply lead to that unknown Bethlehem where its gifts of adoration may be sweetly laid. Hence many who crave the answer to the eternal world-question as to the meaning of it all, of life, of death, of these premonitions of immortality, find false stars, worthless guides, prophets whose message is pitiful and vain. Too eagerly they pursue the deceptive sensation of a passing voice, a tempting hour, too closely follow the poet's words:

Methinks with all this loss I were content
If the mad Past, on which my foot is based,
Were firm, or might be blotted; but the whole
Of life is mixed: the mocking Past will stay;
And if I drink oblivion of a day,
So shorten I the stature of my soul.

The quest, after all, resolves itself into the search for God. Nature and art are both manifestations of the Divine, paradoxical though the statement may seem; for art is of man, but man is of God. (So much the more, we may observe in parenthesis, should man be very careful not to debase his art, whatever form it takes, since by just so much as he dishonours his powers at the call of cupidity or sensuality or popularity, does his soul become enveloped by a treacherous brightness that binds it to earthly and unworthy ideals; and by just so much as he preserves his talents and himself pure and sincere and shameless, does his spirit draw near to the throne from whence they were given. The artist who dishonours his art sins against his own soul, not only cramping its wings, but—which is far worse—depriving it little by little of those aspirations for finer, more splendid flight which had kept it strong. He flies wilfully at the golden chain which binds him to the divine.) The answer to Zophar's remonstrance with Job, "Canst thou by searching find out God?" is that to a certain extent we can, though not "unto perfection." Mystery upon mystery surrounds us; we are as children in the simple rules of an arithmetic-book confronted with the immense bewilderingments of the calculus, confounded, embarrassed, even at times rebellious. Let us ponder the words of a great philosopher, and note his comparison:

To the minnow every cranny and pebble, and quality and accident of its little native creek may have become familiar; but does the minnow understand the ocean tides and periodic currents, the trade winds and monsoons, and moon's eclipses, by all which the condition of its little creek is regulated, and may from time to time (un-miraculously enough) be quite overset and reversed? Such a minnow is man; his creek this planet Earth; his ocean the immeasurable All; his monsoons and periodic currents the mysterious course of Providence through æons of æons.

The little dried acorn that we hold in our hand, that lies on our table—it may stay there for years, inert, apparently dead; but we place it in a handful of mould, and it becomes alive, with roots that strike deeper and deeper, leaves that press upward and, like clenched baby fists, unfold to the morning light. Mystery of mystery! Wherein dwells the miracle—in the dark mould, in the acorn? And why brings this seed an oak, and that one a beech, and a third a blade of wheat, and another a frail, marvellous flower? The flower dies, but the touch of the pollen from some lover unseen has given its casket of precious seed the kiss of life, and the circle of reproduction is completed; so, too, happen the sacred mysteries of human love, of motherhood, of the birth of a new soul. Is there no God behind all this, seen as "through a glass, darkly"? From our tiny point of vantage in the awful expanses of space, whereon the brain cannot think without confusion, we watch the dazzling silvery crescent of Venus, the ardent flame of Mars, the clouded golden glow of the giant Jupiter, the slow sway of Saturn's tremendous rings, the faint, far globe of Uranus, the frugal light of remoter Neptune, deliberately hurling his ashen orb in the deeps round our sun, held immutably to his track as by chains of firmest steel; then past them all we descry, as it were round our horizon-line, the signal-lamps of ships whose long courses will never come near to our own—the pale, pure radiance of Vega, the steady glare of Arcturus, the wax and wane of Algol, spelling to us his ceaseless word across the million leagues of gloom, the iridescent shimmer of kingly Sirius, and a thousand lesser lights—and suddenly we realise that with us in solemn harmony float worlds upon worlds, suns beyond suns, swinging majestically in stupendous motion through distances so vast that the flight of their gleam to us has to be counted in years, not seconds; realise that they have been so from unfathomable time, and will be so when, in the abyss of ages, we are but the dust of an angel's dream. Is there no God behind all this? O poor, dull Atheist, fumbling with thy little keys at the portals of the eternal "whereof our sun is but a porch-lamp," canst thou not pause for one luminous moment? "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades or loose the bands of Orion?" "Canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons? Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven?" Truly "we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon earth are a shadow."

From these profound mysteries that can only be sought adequately with the aid of instruments of man's devising to that wave of flowers breaking down the steep June meadow is but a step; in them all is the God we seek. "The merest nothing reveals His presence, and the greatness of our lives depends on so little." "The Spirit itself," said Paul, "beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God," and it is permissible to think that in these moments of vision arising from simple, natural things seen under certain transforming conditions, or in certain exalted moods, we approach very near to the central fact of the universe, from which all hope springs and radiates—the existence of that immanent, perfect God, careful of man, anxious for his happiness, craving for his worship and his highest thought, yet forbidding him save through his own efforts to touch the divine. The frailty and the ineffectiveness of our few moments of reproach can perhaps be ascribed to the competitive energy of modern life. We find little leisure for contemplation. Time overwhelms us; it is a tragedy; "there are hints of it in the movement of the dial-hand, in the withering of flowers, in the wrinkles on the beautiful face; it comes home with the harvests of autumn, and darkens hope in the eclipses of the sun and moon; the yellowing papers of the poet and the crumbling pyramids of the builder tell of it; it speaks in the waves that break upon the shore, and in the histories that commemorate bygone civilisations; all things decay." All things decay, but to-day we are too liable to suppose that death stands, a grim oppression, at the end of a short vista of years, ravenous and pitiless; held in the grip of this undercurrent of imagination our best strength is sapped in the endeavour to seize the passing hour, to cheat that spectre of a portion of its prey, to eat, drink, and be merry with a feverish earnestness, to accomplish some earthly fame with an almost spiteful triumph. We cannot bring ourselves to regard the collapse of the body as a climax to which life inevitably and easily ascends, a stage in the progress of the soul as absolutely natural as that of life, by which we may in one splendid instant attain that indivisible union with God which in our unspoiled state we crave. In this earthly part of life the body is the soul's only means of expression, its only means of entreating sympathy and companionship from others; the glance of the eye, the clasp of a hand, the tone of a voice, are its strivings after speech, often utterly incompetent to convey the whole passionate, perfect truth when one soul salutes its fellow. What tremendous freedoms, splendid communions, heavenly reasonings together might not be possible when the body has served its purpose and is discarded as the new-winged creature shakes off its clumsy chrysalis—when the soul takes upon itself the finer, untrammelled sight and speech and touch of the infinite? "Write the things which thou hast seen," came the voice to St. John, "and the things which are, and the things which shall be hereafter;" but the vision does not come save by prayer and fasting, and they have gone out of fashion. The vision, however, exists, and if here we stumble towards the light by paths unknown, over hills of desolation and loneliness, and through valleys peopled with unfriendly shadows, it is well to remember that "now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face."

A PROBLEM—AND A SUGGESTION

THERE are some interesting people of whom the world, with every opportunity of mending its ways, takes not the slightest heed, perhaps partly, as a critic has said, because the world is ignored by them. Chance and still chances have been offered to the public to make the acquaintance of an inspired dramatic poem, and, apparently the world is blind. The work was published in Charles Wells's twenty-fifth year—in 1824; the young man then sauntered off to the Continent, where he did nothing for the rest of his life; in 1876 Swinburne and Rossetti clamoured for its republication, and Mr. Watts-Dunton wrote in the Athenæum: "The poem itself—in the revised form—is before the public, to win—for it cannot again miss—its place in English literature." Lastly, in 1908, it was included in Mr. Frowde's edition of the "World's Classics." The total result of these things appears to be that the man who wrote a great poem in a spirit of rivalry with Keats at the age of a little over twenty—and created nothing more, except some vanished prose—attracts as little public attention after death by his work as he did by his extraordinary personality during life. To ninety-nine informed readers out of a hundred Wells is the author of "Tono-Bungay," but that fine novel is not "Joseph and His Brethren." Time proceeds; heroic efforts have been made; yet little emerges. The obscurity of the prior Wells is a problem.

In one of the letters written from Samoa Stevenson bewailed his friends. Wells cared little for his work and less for his reputation. But if he were alive now even he might have a word of reflection upon those who have made it their business to introduce him to the people. Rossetti, Swinburne and Mr. Watts-Dunton are three admirers of whom any poet, living or dead, might be proud; and they have, especially the last two, interpreted his poetry with the generous and penetrative criticism which is their incomparable monopoly; yet we suggest that they have unintentionally done a man of original genius an injury which has worked in a very subtle manner. Both were impressed with the fifty years' neglect of the poet's work—Mr. Watts-Dunton has forwarded many explanations of that neglect—and both proceeded to make amends by brilliant and unquestionable comparisons with former writers. Swinburne, in his introduction, penned many phrases like ". . . stateliness of manner, which recalls the more equable cadences of Shakespeare"; "two such lines . . . would suffice, with a certain school of commentators, to establish the unquestionable partnership of Shakespeare"; "recalls the luxury and exuberance . . . of Marlowe." In fact, a large part of Swinburne's essay is a proof that "Joseph" is Elizabethan. Rossetti stated that the play was more Shakespearean than anything out of Shakespeare, and cited the influence of Blake. Mr. Watts-Dunton, quoting from both, compares the richness of Keats, and we learn that in richness Wells comes nearer to Shakespeare than did Keats. In the midst of all this—the above is a microscopic selection—one is tempted to ask: What of Charles Wells? From a perusal of the Prefatory Note on Rossetti and Wells the answer might come: Oh, he was a protégé of Rossetti!

Of course, this method is the most accredited and customary of estimating a poet's position; and, of course, since Swinburne has said it, the affinity with Shakespeare exists. But more, it is obvious. One might fill columns with phrases and lines which seem to come right out of Shakespeare, without drawing from Swinburne's selection. Not merely is the influence of Blake apparent; such phrases as:

"To me a simple flower is cloth'd with thoughts That lead the mind to Heaven" suggest Wordsworth to the first observer. Not merely is much of the richness comparable with Keats, there is the same delight in words, playing on words, and repetition to excess. "Umber" occurs thrice in a few lines, "zon'd" is a favourite, "golden" is almost cheap by reason of its frequency. Not merely is the inspiration of these English masters in poetry easily demonstrable, but

"Surely, my brothers, you are not so bad,
So bloody, so unnaturally given," is plainly derived from a source which, naturally, considering the subject, supplies very much. Indeed, it would be surprising if, in work so young, what Lecky called the formative influences of style were not superficially and abundantly manifest. But it is just because the influences are so patent that it would have been perhaps advisable not to have drawn such extreme attention to them at the first; it is perhaps just the intended praise that has worked as blame. For what sort of an effect would such criticism have upon the public which was to see that this poem did not again "miss its place"—upon αἱ πολλοὶ for ever a-gape for some new thing? Here was a man not merely unknown—worse still, forgotten. They were told he was a great poet, worthy of revival, although on a first publication his work "fell dead from the press." What was the "apology" of his admirers?—he wrote Shakespearean blank verse. That was something, of course, but it was also rather too obvious. They wanted more—a message, a fresh touch, something new. In the case of Wells it was difficult to find. Wherein was the man justified as an original poet? Would the critics point it out? In fact, it is possible that those who saw, and see, no difference between slavishly imitative work and the rich fruits of study, have been inclined to reject Charles Wells as an imitator, as a man without a "style." Misunderstanding the critics and confirmed in their mistake by a doubting and cursory inspection of the text, many may have closed the book and its remembrance with a sigh for another secondhand. For the one thing no public will endure, in its poetry at any rate, is a simulacrum of plagiarism; it has no profound perception of originality, but it worships it; it will read Shakespeare, when it will—in Shakespeare; if it is told, or thinks it is told, that a new man is a disciple and again a disciple, it will have small time for his words. In fact, in the very peculiar case of Wells, very unlikely in any circumstance to make a great impression with but one published work, it might have been better to have drawn attention to the new features rather than to the old, at least to defer the method by comparison to an analysis of his own particular worth.

But to prove to a public that refuses to read him that the man was unique (as Swinburne and the rest never intended to deny) is something of a problem. It is all the harder precisely because his originality was profound and his art impersonal. For he did not rely—as so many writers do to-day—on shallow trick-work or a facile exhibition of his own superficialities. "Joseph and His Brethren" must be read, even reread, before it convinces by a combination of poetic and dramatic feeling which, in no other writing, produces exactly the same effect. We freely admit, at the risk of repetition, that the passages which appeal most strikingly at a first reading may often be found to be derived. But the age of the writer may be remembered; and, even so, Mr. Watts-Dunton's phrase, "The Great Might Have Been of English Poetry," is liable to misinterpretation. The wonderful close of the First Act, culminating in the stricken Jacob's simple words:

"Carry me in, for I am very weak,
And let there be no noise," is proof by itself that the author possessed an instinctive and developed dramatic sense. The delineation of Potiphar's wife in the second act could only have been done by one man; if in the subtle and passionate dialogue the influence of Shakespeare is felt, Browning is anticipated throughout. "At last I leave you, sir," says the infuriated and baffled Phraxanor, "without a single comfort in the world," and, as she goes, the ruined Joseph replies, "God is in Heaven, madam, with your leave." Much study does not enable a man to write like that.

With a general analysis of Wells's excellence we can have nothing to do here. His absolute fidelity to the Bible story in spirit and in phrase (in spite of some anachronisms) has been pointed out before. It is enough to say that the original is expanded to contain the poetry, the poetry does not swamp the Eastern tale. But a man who can be witty in such a story without writing out of tone is surely something rare. Extractive quotation is nearly always destructive, and the following is hardly the best possible example, but it suggests the heavy sort of irony that is Wells's compromise with wit and humour. "Come—come," expostulates Joseph, "you are too dull—churlishly given." "Aye," grumbles the Chief Baker, "I am given to a dungeon cell, and, wonderful to you, do not rejoice." But of all the factors that make the personality of "Joseph and His Brethren" the most significant of those that appear to have gone unnoticed is the apt exposition of the commonplace, or, rather, the individualisation of the universally appealing, which is one of the prerogatives of great writers. Wells is not always felicitous here; occasionally his immaturity shows through—immaturity though the work was revised in old age; occasionally the fourth act is dull, if not banal; and once, at least, crudity breaks bounds when Joseph exclaims:

"Strangers! What men are these?—not Egypt born—Great God! they are my brothers—sure they're come,
Driven from valed tents in search of food."

But the nearly sublime is often ridiculous, even in greater poets, and Wells does not often offend. His method is various. Either he turns an obvious phrase into a striking one by a slight touch, as in:

"More than the mind of man dare ape to think,"

and in:

"I bless thee from the middle of my heart;"

or his effect is produced simply by artistic placing and skilful preparation:

"All is not love in sensuality" loses everything but obviousness in losing the context. It comes daringly from Joseph to Phraxanor. Again, Myrah's simple interpolation:

"... Then you would say That there is nothing in the world but love—" shines with startling clarity in the midst of Phraxanor's burning metaphors. Thirdly, he sometimes convinces by sheer force of language, as when he writes:

"... Things of joy to die
Upon the action—Joy is the grave of joy.
And all the past that was so long a-doing
Is swallow'd in the minute that's to come."

Wells is not rich, because he gorgeously reflects Keats, or Shakespeare. Neither is his writing "thin," as even the most brilliant exercise must be. Space forbids quotation; but in the third act there is a 200-line description of an Eastern processional ceremony which, for sustained imagery, for a masterly exposition of the arabesque and the grotesque, for a combination of horror and beauty, would be hard to match. Surely an attitude that emphasises Wells's debt to others is in danger of minimising our debt to Wells. The best means of solving the problem of a century of neglect is to present him on his own merits to the public, not as a Shakespeare student or as a Rossetti find. "Brand" was played in Christiania. News comes that an English audience is to witness "Peer Gynt." "Joseph and His Brethren," with its twenty-four scenes and long monologues and prologues, was not written for production; but at least Act II. is fitted for the stage. If "In a Balcony" can be played, so can "The Defiance of Phraxanor." We offer the suggestion, for what it is worth, to the managers of the Afternoon Theatre, who, at the time of writing, are in need of matter.

LAURUS NOBILIS

Laurus Nobilis: Chapters on Art and Life. By VERNON LEE. (Lane, 3s. 6d.)

IN the essay as a form of literary art, the lady who writes pleasantly under the name of Vernon Lee has attained a fair measure of success, but the reader who approaches this latest volume of hers in a critical mood will find himself at a loss, for a while, to state a definite opinion on it. Many platitudes, much good sense, some beauty, and a few assertions which will probably strike him as altogether erroneous, combine to produce rather a wavering image in his mind. The style of her previous books has pleased us more, and the platitudes—that awful danger of the essayist—have not been so abounding. The parenthesis, when used to the unconscionable extent of seven or eight bracketed interpolations in a couple of pages, is an irritant to bewilder the most lenient reader; it almost spoils one or two of the papers. Again, the recurrent personal phrases—"I hope I have made clear enough"—"Let us now proceed to"—"I have said that"—"I think you will all of you admit that"—are inappropriate to and incongruous with the austerity of the subject, and are unhappily suggestive of sermonising or of platform oratory of a mediocre type; they get on the nerves and mar the prose irremediably.

All the essays concern themselves with branches of the same topic—the relation of art to life: a theme large enough, in all conscience, but one which demands, we fear, a deeper vein of thought, inquiry, and deliberation, a finer power of arrangement, elimination, and exposition, than the author can claim to possess. They would make pretty little separate flower-pot plants for—shall we say?—the window-sill of the Saturday Westminster Gazette, quite unambitious, and admirable in their way; but presented to the world as a stout tree we must say that a considerable amount of pruning and forcing would have improved the effect. Some of the foliage is too thin. Discussing the notion that love of beauty "can help to bring about a better distribution of the world's riches" the author asks: "What are the bulk of worldly possessions to their owners: houses, parks, plate, jewels, superfluous expenditure of all kinds (and armies and navies when we come to national wastefulness)—what are all these ill-distributed riches save ideas, ideas futile and ungenerous, food for the soul, but food upon which the soul grows sick and corrupteth?" This sort of questioning comes perilously near the borderline either of nonsense or of incomprehensibility—it does not much matter which. Later on we have these sentences: "One thing seems certain, that the artistic activities are those which bring man into emotional communion with external Nature; and that such emotional communion is necessary for man's thorough spiritual health." So far we are in hearty agreement, albeit the sentiment is not new; but from the corollary which the author strives to maintain we can but differ completely: "Perception of cause and effect, generalisation of law, reduces the universe, indeed, to what man's intellect can grasp; but in the process of such reduction to the laws of man's thought, the universe is shorn of its very power to move man's emotion and overwhelm his soul." Surely precisely the reverse holds good for any thinking human being? The more we learn of cause and effect, of law and splendour of law in the cosmos, the more we thrill with adoration, the more we feel that the place whereon we stand is holy ground. The flower loses none of its beauty, nor a whit of its power to move us, when we can perceive its pistil and stamens, its various, marvellous, methodic equipment for preservation and reproduction. The mysterious perturbations of Uranus, worked out with infinite care by the finest and most delicate mathematical formulæ, did they not lead to the most astounding and beautiful discovery of modern astronomy, to the assertion that at a certain spot in the heavens at a certain hour another planet ought to be found, a planet which had never yet been seen; the direction of the telescope to that spot, and the recognition in a moment in the pale disc that swam into view of an outer world in allegiance to our sun, in harmony with ourselves, hurling itself in lonely grandeur round its prodigious orbit? Is there no poetry, no "power to move man's emotion" in this? Surely, yes.

We like best of these essays the one entitled, "The Art and the Country." Vernon Lee is at her highest level when she discards philosophy and merely describes things seen. Take, for instance, this charming little picture of a corner of her favourite land:

Save in the lushness of early summer, Tuscany is, on the whole, pale; a country where the loveliness of colour is that of its luminousness, and where light is paramount. From this arises, perhaps, the austerity of its true summer—summer when fields are bare, grass burnt to delicate cinnamon and russet, and the hills, with their sere herbs and bushes, seem modelled out of pale rosy or amethyst light; an austerity for the eye corresponding to a sense of healthfulness given by steady, intense heat, purged of all damp, pure like the scents of dry leaves, of warm cypress resin and of burnt thyme and myrrh of the stony ravines and stubby fields. On such August days the plain and the more distant mountains will sometimes be obliterated, leaving only the inexpressible suavity of the hills on the same side as the sun, made of the texture of the sky, lying against it like transparent and still luminous shadows. . . . That effect is the most powerful, sweetest, and most restorative in all Nature, perhaps; a bath for the soul in pure light and air.

The severest critic could hardly improve on this, and we could have wished for more papers in the same happy strain. Other dissertations on "Art and Usefulness" and "Wasteful Pleasures" are interesting, and in parts suggestive, but on the whole the feelings of pleasant anticipation with which we usually open a book of this author's prose have suffered a slight interruption.

CORNISH TALES

Our Little Town. By CHARLES LEE. (Gibbings and Co., Ltd., 3s. 6d.).

THERE are not many abstract qualities more difficult to weave into words than the charm which pervades any particular district, such as the western portion of our island, and especially does this difficulty make itself felt when the fact is taken into consideration that the majority of readers must naturally be ignorant personally of that charm, that aura of the land which is so irresistible to those who have once experienced it. Whatever strangers to the West-country may think of this book (and they can hardly be hostile to a work so full of humour and humanity), to one hailing from Cornwall it is a pure delight. "Our Little Town" is Porthjulyan—there is a lingering music in the sound; it is reminiscent of Luxulyan, Polperro, Porthpean, Burngullow, and a hundred other haunting Cornish names, and it has evidently a beloved original for which is reserved a very warm place in the author's heart. The life of the village is portrayed in chapters which are as good and as exciting as those of many a novel, and as a sure test of their quality, the reader finds himself as absorbingly concerned about the ultimate fate of the silk hat of "James-over-to-shop," or the choice of an organist for the Methodist chapel, or of twenty other breathless events, as he usually is when the destinies of great nations swing in the balance. Of that tall hat—the only one in the locality—we must just sketch the history; it is too good to miss. James had recently married Julia—the surnames do not matter—and a visitor from London, staying with them, lost his hat in a high wind and had to return to town hurriedly in a cloth cap belonging to the young fisherman, promising compensation. This arrived duly in the shape of a brand-new "topper," much to James's discomfort and his wife's pride:

"Well now," said Julia, as she carefully extracted the gift from its swathings of tissue paper—"well now, I do call this handsome of Mr. Smith! A drum-hat! How it do shine! Real handsome, to be sure, and cost a pretty penny, I'll be bound."

"Shouldn't wonder," said Jamesy, regarding it with uneasy disfavour. "But what's going to do by en? That's what I want to know."

"Do, thou bufflehead?" cried Julia, with a fond smile to soften the rude word. "Do? Why, wear en, to be sure!"

Their walk to chapel next morning was humorously elevated by Porthjulyan into a triumphal procession. Subdued cheers were raised, hats were doffed, curseys dropped, and a band of urchins beating imaginary drums cleared the way for the pair. Julia walked along, rigidly unconscious, her pretty nose in the air; while the victim of fashion, his hand convulsively grasping the unruly hat, alternately twisted an uneasy deprecatory grin on the spectators, and relaxed the same to whisper a savage, "I told 'e so!" in his wife's ear.

James's life becomes a misery for a short time, but he "gets even" by wearing the objectionable article every day, and standing fire of chaff from his mates manfully; strange tales of a mad fisherman circulated, and Julia was almost in tears. But a day came when the weather kept James at home idle, with the hat on the table, brim upwards, and his wife silent and miserable. Then entered Spotty, a pet Bantam of privileges, hunting for a suitable depository for eggs:

From the window-sill to Jamesy's shoulder was a single fluttering leap; another took her from Jamesy's shoulder to the table. Two steps she advanced, then she paused, with one diminutive foot upraised, the claws of it clenching and relaxing with emotion, her abstracted left eye on Julia, her excited right on the hat. . . . Jamesy drew a long breath. Spotty lowered her foot, took a slow hesitant step, and stood again at one-legged attention. A deft jump, a balancing wing momentarily outstretched, and she stood safe and steady on the hat brim. She peeped within. Her right eye ascertained that the interior was as roomy as any bantam could desire; her left made sure that it was clean, and comfortably, nay, luxuriously lined. The next moment Spotty had disappeared inside the hat. . . . Two interminable minutes they waited, with hearts that beat absurdly high. Then, as in a conjuring trick, Spotty appeared on the hat-brim, shook her ruffled feathers into composure, ogled her two friends simultaneously with two divergent glittering eyes, and remarked in tones of triumphant assurance: "Tuk-tuk-tuk-tuk-tra-a-aa-tuk!"

Together they rushed to the hat, and Jamesy's arm was about Julia's waist as they peeped within and beheld the tiniest, frailest, most delightful egg that ever mortal bantam laid.

So came reconciliation, and the solution of the difficulty of their first quarrel for Jamesy and Julia; and now the hat is only used by neighbours on the occasion of a wedding—neighbours, of course, who in turn occupy the urgent and honourable position of bridegroom.

Not one of these little sketches is dull, and nearly all of them touch the comical side of things, although the letters of Thyrsa, who was desirous of writing "potry" for the editor of a local paper, border at times on the pathetic. Thyrsa, however, did the sensible thing—married a strapping young fisherman who gave her no encouragement so far as literature was concerned, but dowered her with a jolly baby and the joys of a cosy household. Mr. Lee has done well in merely suggesting the Cornish speech—had he tried strenuously to reproduce that inimitable music he would have spoiled his book; for in truth no arrangement of letters can give that cadence, that singing "lift" at the close of a sentence, which is so entrancing. Our readers should keep this delightful volume by them—they will want to dip into it again and again.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The King in Yellow. By ROBERT CHAMBERS. (Constable, 6s.)

MR. CHAMBERS is responsible for a lengthy list of novels, and is apparently content to take second or third place and to bid for popularity when he might achieve, judging from a portion of his work in this collection of short stories (noted as a re-issue), something really fine. For "The King in Yellow" and its dependant sketches, which give the book its title, we care nothing—indeed, they are simply sensational, and for the most part absurd fiction, which had better have been consigned to the friendly oblivion of magazine pages. But such little studies as "The Street of the Four Winds" and "Rue Barrée," strangely incongruous in such company, have the essence of true artistry, and compensate in a measure for the disappointment and the unconvincing horrors of the first hundred pages. Mr. Chambers can be exceedingly gruesome if he likes, and it is possible that some nervous people will shudder creepily and find it necessary to leave the bedroom light burning if they happen to read of the frightful little man with the false ears at an unwisely late hour.

"The Street of Our Lady of the Fields," and the other sketches of student life in Paris, are excellent, and if the author had only kept the whole of his stories on the level of these we should have found little comment but that of praise for his book. It seems to us a mistake, however, to have bound examples of two styles so very different between the same covers.

Concerning Himself. By VICTOR L. WHITECHURCH. (Unwin, 6s.)

MR. WHITECHURCH has given us here a story in the autobiographical manner, dealing in his usual interesting way with ecclesiastical matters. The hero, Gerald Sutton, recounts the chief events of his career from boyhood to the achievement of a small living in the country, and if there is nothing startling or even very remarkable in his development, the material of human affairs is displayed in an attractive style. His father, as irresponsible as "Roy Richmond," but not quite so honourable and courtly a personage, is cleverly drawn, but the uncle upon whose shoulders falls the burden of Gerald's education and support is rather more of an automaton than the author intended him to be, we fancy; his stiffness and his absorption in the interminable study of genealogies are not very convincing. We like the boy and girl, Alec and Maud Winter, who are very natural indeed, and who do not lose that characteristic when they arrive at the adult stage. Through the vicissitudes of a misplaced affection for the Squire of Frattenbury's daughter, Gerald passes safely to the final discovery that Maud and he were more suited for each other, and thus all ends happily. There are some capital glimpses at the inner life of a big theological college, and on the whole the book repays reading; but an author who can quote a scrap of Greek and drop into French should be more cautious to avoid such mistakes as "neither the Squire nor Violet were at home"; also we really think he need not take such desperate pains to split his verbs—"to utterly abandon" and "to suddenly show" are a couple of unpleasant examples.

The Actress. By LOUISE CLOSSER HALE. (Constable, 6s.)

WE all, it is to be presumed, desire originality in the books we read, and in the hour or two spent with the sprightly little actress who is the heroine of this story hardly anybody will be disappointed. Miss Rhoda Miller, the lady in question, tells her adventures in the first person, and manages to attain an effect of familiarity which is piquant without becoming obtrusive or annoying. Starting as a fairly successful member of a New York company, the chance of her life comes with an offer to take one of the principal parts in a play to be staged in London; but she has a great friend, Aaron Adams, a broker, who is strongly set against the thought of the stage as a career for her. In fact, he presents to her in a charming spirit of camaraderie the attractions of domesticity, with himself as the "leading man." Rhoda, however, does not think she is in love with him, and at any rate the idea of captivating an English audience pulls too hard for resistance, so over here with the company she comes. Her hopes are realised—the play goes well, the Press is kind, and the public responds to every joke readily; the description of the state of mind of the actors on the first night is splendidly done. Then creeps in the spectre of loneliness, and at last Rhoda breaks down utterly, discovering that she has loved Aaron all the time, and believing, through specious evidence, that he has married a girl friend of hers. Aaron's arrival on the scene in London at the precise moment when he is most needed is a trifle too near the limits of probability, but that is the only fault we have to find with the book. The life of the stage, its friendships, jollities, disappointments, is admirably depicted, and with it all more than one little romance is outlined. The story is told in terse and very effective style, without any superabundance of the offensive and transitory slang terms which seem to be the only method known to some writers of indicating an American "atmosphere." A happy ending, as we have suggested, is conceded, and after the heartbreaking struggles of the heroine to conquer her loneliness and her nervous dread, we deserve it as much as she does.

Maurice Maeterlinck. By GERARD HARRY. (Paris: Charles Carrington, 2fr. 50c.)

WHAT delicate philosophy of life may eventually evolve itself from the gossamer speculations and mellifluous theorisings of M. Maeterlinck it is hardly yet possible to say, but, without going to the extremes of admiration which are affected by some of his compatriots and disciples, we may admit that the works of so calm an observer, so fine a thinker, so beautiful a writer, as he has shown himself to be, are worthy of a high regard in contemporary literature. In the little volume which has reached us from the Faubourg Montmartre no attempt is made to discuss Maeterlinck deeply, or to estimate with any exactness his position; it is merely a friendly portrayal of the man and his aims. It is, in fact, a trifle too obviously friendly to be considered as good criticism, even as far as it goes. Resemblances are mentioned as having been traced between Maeterlinck and Shakespeare, Marlowe, Webster, Poe, Baudelaire, Ibsen, which may or may not exist; in any case the labour of defining such affinities seems to us unnecessary. Maeterlinck is quite charming in his mystical wanderings among the flowers and the bees, quite competent to stand alone, and his work is so individual that comparisons are not of much use.

The text is adorned here and there with those gems of metaphor and allusion which seem brought to perfection only in the French language, and there is a very happy page comparing Maeterlinck to one of a company of travellers on an unknown journey by train, silent, apart, endeavouring by scrutiny of the flying country—"apparitions brusques, apparences fuyantes"—to ascertain his position and destination. "Quel mystère avons nous laissé derrière nous? Dans quel mystère entrerons-nous au bout de ce voyage d'un jour?"

A little prose sketch from the short-lived "Pleiade," dated 1886, is given at the close of the book, and some excellent reproductions of photographs complete this interesting little study of the Belgian writer.

ITALIAN BACKGROUNDS—II.

TWO GARDENS.

A DIM, mellow atmosphere, through which the swallows wheel and dip, swims over the closely cultivated fields, the flat-faced farms, the villas marked by the spearhead of a single cypress or the sable cloud which shows a congregation of them, the vine-ridged slopes, the ashen-grey olives, the tall poplars, fantastically sharp against a background of hills which are here, not the bare and snow-scarred mountainous sort, but "the kind the early painters loved, the blue ones low and shapely, that we see as suitable backgrounds for Virgins and saints and angels in so many pictures, better loved than the overwhelming kind where Death and Morning walk."

The windless day is heavy with heat, the leaves of the hedgerows are so tender and sappy that their very essence seems to cool the air, to fall like a spray of water into the thirsty lanes, where the red-tasseled mules are driven by the dust-covered peasants. But within the grounds of the villa is the greenness of a watered garden, Paradisi semper amœna virentia. It is shaded by plantations where the filmy-winged moths are fluttering in the green light, above the tall, seeded grasses of the meadow blue with salvias, and gilt with branching buttercups, coloured with all the "cool, meek-blooded flowers" of the fields, while overhead white and rosy-flowered pyramidal chestnut trees and snowy acacias rustle down their honey-scented showers and wreck of white and red. A still, grey lake enclosed in a thicket, cooled by a slender drizzling fountain, and rimmed with rushes and tall grasses upon which a bloom-like mist lies thickly, has in its centre an island, which is a temple of the Nymphs, while, scattered about the garden is a profusion of exedras and semi-circular arbours of pink brick or pink-washed plaster. Galileo, a weather-stained Medicean Venus, the term of an indistinguishable emperor, stands forgotten among the rising wheat, or on the edge of the plantations, littered with falling blossom-scales and the fading petals of acacia and rose, while over the quiet precinct passes "a meadow gale of early spring which mingles the fragrance of all the flowers of the field," and the nightingales begin among the pyramidal chestnuts of the villa.

"What greater delight is there," writes an old author, "than to behold the earth apparelled with plants, as with a robe of embroidered work, set with orient pearls and garnished with great diversities of rare and costly jewels?" But the Puccini, the owners of the garden, were not living in the villa, but in their house in the streets of a town not many miles away. Only the dead Puccini, in their mausoleum in the most weed-grown and deserted portion of the garden—a mausoleum washed pink and daubed with a pitiful imitation of ornaments of black and white marble, guarded by a ridiculous and tottering gardieu des morts—know the dews and keep watch upon the promise of the gardens.

The Giusti garden, with its main walk an avenue of dark cypresses, won the admiration of Goethe, both for its beautiful situation and for its monstrous trees, pointing like spikes into the air. "A tree," he writes, "whose branches, the oldest as well as the youngest, are striving to reach heaven—a tree which will last three hundred years is well worthy of veneration, and judging from the time when this garden was laid out, these trees have already attained that venerable age."

The garden is laid out in a series of terraces, like the garden of which Sir Henry Wootton writes, "for the mariner perchance incomparable," into which "the first Access was a high Walk like a Terrace, from whence might be taken a general view of the whole Plot below, but rather in a delightful confusion, than with any plain distinction of the pieces. From this, the Beholder, descending many steps, was afterwards conveyed again by several mountings and valings to various entertainments and of his scent and sight, which I shall not need to describe, for that were poetical; let me only note this, that every one of these diversities was as if he had been magically transported into a new garden."

In the Giusti garden, the lowest terrace is but a square and not very extensive plot full of parched flower-beds, in the midst of which stands a two-tiered fountain, with a weedy, rank-smelling basin, glazed by its dripping water, rimmed with a sharp golden light against the descending sun, and tenanted by one harsh-voiced frog. A terrace where the grass grows tall, where the grey midges are floating over the shimmering awns like many-coloured pollen, or winged and wandering seeds, is presided over by its weather-stained Nymphs, or garden deities. The sun is melting in his descent over the melting horizon; the pale wave-like serrations of the mountain-range are fading in the amber pool of light that surrounds him, where thin wisps and filaments of cloud idling motionless in the air are rimmed with a light as of fine brass, and between them lie yet more faint and extended webs of vaporous light, amber thistle-down, fine, evanescent, hardly more noticeable than the faint lines and pencillings of translucent horn. Sharply into the air rise the shafts and campaniles of the towered city, more sharply still the long drawn cypresses, dark as a blade of bronze, tapering to the height of the rocky back-wall of the steep garden.

The crescent of an unkindled moon hangs very high up in the paling sky, above the roofs of Verona, brown and grey like the irregular tesserae of some ruined Roman pavement, above the dusty and fragrant alleys of box, above the cypresses, above the upturned mirror of the grey Adige—so smooth, seen from afar, so tumultuous on nearer view as it washes round the old city walls.

The bloom of twilight falls upon the irregular roofs as the sun dips behind the blue bastions of a western cloud, where in a rent he kindles into a steady rosy light, like glowing charcoal. A little cool wind of evening rises and blows the leaves of the bronze-hued trees together, and blows the blackbird's mellow whistle and the hiss of the flying swallows about the steep garden, where the paths are littered with the dry and wrinkled blossoms of the once-honeyed acacia and laburnum. The trees sink into twilight, become sombre and formless. The light goes out from the mirror of the Adige. Suddenly the air overhead becomes filled with a shrill, confused noise from a numerous body of swallows, looking like a great swarm of gnats, small specks floating like the lees in a yellow wine, high up in the air, while a frog lifts his harsh, melancholy cry from the weedy basin of the fountain, and the angelus, with its plangent note of appeal, is rising from all the rolling bells of Verona, as if in lament for the flowery splendour and consummated glory of the year, "as thereafter immediately beginning to draw near its end, as the first yellow leaf crosses it, in the first severer wind."

THE END OF JUNE

THE broad grey river, netted with variable wrinkles, fled away like a mill-race in mid-steam, bright with moving silver scars and scales of splintered light, spinning little dimpled maelstroms to the sides, and knocking against the grey stones of the bank, that are patched with brown moss. Over the expanse of its shining street, over the dry-tongued reed-beds, where the tall plumes are still high above the young green, numberless insects floating like flying blossoms—sulphur butterflies, bees droning their distant organ-notes, and pale insects involved in their own white blur of beating wings:

Out of the river issued living sparks
And on all sides sank down into the flowers.

The low, cool-rooted willows, with the sun filtering between their grey leaves, pale as the silver of gossamers, waver in the yielding air. Over all, many white clouds float like a thick curd within the blue bowl of the sky; and upon smooth, grayling-haunted pools where the shadowy unrealities seen on their shining glass are perhaps not less shadowy than the realities they mirror. The voice of the high-stationed lark comes to us enriched by the stream. To the north, one smoke-coloured cloud obscures one side of the bright sky with its veil, and upon it a double rainbow, so bright that its chorded colours seem printed by the eye upon the neighbouring continents of cloud, shines through the trickling rain. The smaller and more intense arc has an outer band of transparent flame-colour, separated from the inner rim of clear ice-green by a narrow interspace of melting yellow light. Between the span of this arch the rain trickles down upon the warm tree-muffled hills and field; here the beeches shine in the vivid light, here the odorous snow drips from the chestnut, and the hawthorn upon fields of uncrushed grass, where the moist breath of vapour is rising from the rushy bottoms and in blue upon the horns of the hills.

The succulent flowers in the meadow, the millions of hollow-globed dandelion docks, like some carved toy of laborious Orient ivory, the tall umbrells of cow-parsley, delicate as the powdery spray of a fountain, the branching gilt-flowered buttercups, the honey-breathed clover, low-growing speedwell and herb-robert, with many invisible "cool meek-blooded flowers," each lending its own peculiar fragrance to the moist wind, move continually in a wavering morrice above the grey and green grass, perfuming it with myrrh and frankincense, with all the powders of the merchant.

The sun, from beneath a blue cloud, pours his rayed water-carriers, regular as the pale amber sticks of a delicate fan, upon the heavy-headed elms, steeped in a film of blue, and upon an infinite distance built up of wet light and pale blue cloud-like forms of hill and plain. In the hedges the wreath of the hawthorn is pink and seared as if with a fiery breath, its fallen snow lying upon the ripe grasses, or blown this way and that by the gushes of the wet wind that passes over the meadow, smoothing it into evanescent grey furrows, like ripples rocking light upon the sea; so that the rich colour of the meadow, clouded and barred like the shining pelt of some wondrous animal, rich with the gold dust of buttercups, the warm brown of seeded grasses, the infinite variety of broken colours of indistinguishable flowers, wavers like the sea, suffering, like this, a perpetual change

Into something rich and strange.

In the wood a host of slender rods and brown-tipped croziers of the bracken are rising from the warm, ruddy soil, above the fading blue-bells, between larches bearing on their languid branches a heavy weight of tiny cones, rosy and brown. The wood is filled with the vibration of many bees, the drone of wasps, the thinner murmur of innumerable hovering flies, the noise, perhaps, that Richard Jefferies knew when the sunlight strikes the resonant harp of the earth; while louder still, from beyond the wood, the corncrake is heard, calling harshly to his mate among the green corn; and the wood pigeon among the heavy-headed elms summons to an eternal sleep.

Upon the floor of the wood the sunlight lies in moving discs of gold, irregular patches of gold leaf, bars of freckled light between the shadeless larches, upon the open rides leading to the motey distance, where the tall masks of the pines, with their drooping banner-like boughs, are so close together as to make a "concentrated light, a light quite special, meaning enclosure, almost sanctuary, in which all colour takes a solemn vividness," the redness of the beech leaves on the ground, the green of knotted moss, and of beech saplings. Here the "chapels' lone desire" in the many-aisled woods look as though they were intended to hold some holy relic and brood over it, in the green sanctuary light where the long-drawn flowers shine strangely, like votive-candles before some bright reliquary.

PHYSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

PROCEEDINGS AT THE MEETING HELD JUNE 11TH, 1909.

Dr. C. CHREE, F.R.S., President, in the Chair.

A paper by Dr. Russell and Mr. Arthur Wright on "The Arthur Wright Electrical Device for evaluating Formulæ and solving Equations," was read by Dr. Russell. In this device special slide resistances are used. If R be the resistance of one of these and a metallic finger make contact with it at a point where the scale reading is x , the resistance between this finger and the terminal of the slide is R/x . The scales of the slides are graduated logarithmically as in the ordinary slide-rule. Hence the processes of multiplication and division can be done mechanically by sliding them against exactly similar fixed scales. If we connect a number of these slide resistances in parallel, since the current is inversely proportional to the resistance, the sum of the currents through them will be proportional to the sum of the readings of the contact fingers. We can easily balance by a null method this current against the current going through a single slide resistance X by means of a Wheatstone's bridge arrangement. In this case the reading on X when there is a balance gives the sum of the readings on all the other slides. Similarly we can subtract numbers by putting slides representing these numbers in parallel with X and then obtain a balance by altering the reading on X . It is also shown how the variable arms of the bridge can be usefully employed in making the calculations.

By clamping the contact fingers inclined at certain angles to a rod which can be moved at right angles to the slides, it is easy to obtain the values on X of $f(x)$ when where the indices m, n, p, \dots may be positive, negative, or fractional, and the coefficients may be positive or negative numbers. In particular if the reading on X be zero when x is x_1 then x_1 is a root of the equation $f(x) = 0$.

$$f(x) = ax^m + bx^n + cx^p + \dots,$$

A model of this device for solving an equation of any degree consisting of not more than four terms was shown. In this model the slide resistances are fixed on a rigid framework and the contact fingers are wires which can be fixed at any desired angles $\cot^{-1}m, \cot^{-1}n, \cot^{-1}p$ with the slides, where m, n , and p are the indices of the powers of x in the equation. A few dry cells and a lecture-table galvanometer were employed. Moving the framework until there is no deflection of the galvanometer, the pointer attached to it indicates at once a root of the equation. The inaccuracy of the results found by means of this model is of the order of one per cent. It is explained how approximate values of the imaginary roots of numerical equations can be found by the device. It is also explained how it can be employed to solve very complicated equations. It is shown, for instance, that a device with four slide resistances like the model exhibited can be used to find approximate values of the roots of numerical equations of the form

$$a/x^m + b/f(x) = cx^n + dF(x),$$

when the values of $f(x)$ and $F(x)$ have been computed or found experimentally for various values of x . The same device also can be used to find the approximate values of x which satisfy the equation

$$a_1 l_1^{a_1 x} + a_2 l_2^{a_2 x} + a_3 l_3^{a_3 x} + a_4 l_4^{a_4 x} = 0$$ when the numerical values of the constants are known.

Prof. C. H. Lees expressed his interest in the device and referred to the large number of calculations that could be performed with it.

Dr. W. H. Eccles congratulated the authors, and referring to the fact that the machine could be used to solve a bi-quadratic, asked if it was possible to determine the two quadratic factors by means of it.

A paper on "The Echelon Spectroscope, its secondary action and the structure of the green mercury line" was read by Mr. H. Stansfield. The paper describes an investigation of the action of an echelon spectroscope and the results obtained as to the structure of the green mercury line given by an Arons lamp. The echelon spectroscope employed was arranged so that the auxiliary prism could be mounted next to the echelon. The dispersion of the prism may be added to, or subtracted from, the dispersion of the echelon, and the change of four per cent. in the dispersion thereby obtained gives a method of determining whether two lines in the spectrum belong to the same order. The theory of the primary action of the echelon in the reversed position, when the light leaves by the largest plate, is compared with the theory of the echelon in the usual position. Fabry and Perot spectra are produced by the secondary action of the echelon, that is by the reflection of light at the surfaces of the plates. When the echelon is tilted the twice reflected or secondary light may be separated from the primary and parts of the Fabry and Perot circles observed with a wide slit. The secondary light also undergoes the primary echelon treatment, and, with a narrow slit, is confined to the points of intersection of the two systems of spectra, giving spectra similar to those obtained by Gehrcke and Baeyer by crossing two plane-parallel plates, a single wave-length being represented by a point in each order and a short continuous spectrum by a line. When the echelon is in the ordinary position, the secondary spectra are lines similar to the primary echelon lines and may be observed moving across the broad central line when the echelon table is slowly rotated; they show up much more clearly on the continuous background of the spectrum of the green line given by a hot quartz lamp. The results as to the structure of the green line are compared with other echelon results, and with those published by Gehrcke and Baeyer. The agreement between the independent methods, as to the number and position of the components, is now fairly close.

Dr. Lees referred to the importance of the secondary action, and asked the author if it was now possible to say definitely whether a line observed in an echelon spectrum is genuine or is produced by the instrument.

The author said that Gehrcke and Baeyer had hoped to supply the means of settling doubts of this kind when they eliminated the ghosts from their green line spectrum by their method of "interference points." Since then, however, two faint lines had been added to the list of components. With the possible exception of one faint line agreement had now been arrived at between two independent methods.

A paper entitled "The proposed International Unit of Candle Power" was read by Mr. C. C. Paterson. The paper discusses the units of Candle Power at present officially accepted in Great Britain, France, the United States of America, and Germany. The numerous intercomparisons which have taken place during the past five years between these units show that the candle, as interpreted in France, Great Britain, and the United States respectively, has practically the same value in the three countries. The authorities in the gas and electric interest in the United States are prepared to adjust their units of candle power to bring them to a single value, which is to be the same as the British and French units. The paper gives the results of comparisons showing that within the limits of experimental error the British and French units are identical. The change involved in the unit at present maintained at the Bureau of Standards, Washington, is shown to be 1.6 per cent.

The agreement thus established forms the subject of an official memorandum from the National Physical Laboratory (with the concurrence of the Metropolitan Gas Referees), the Bureau of Standards, Washington, and the Laboratoire Centrale, Paris. The proposal to call the common unit of light to be maintained jointly by the National Standardising Laboratories of America, France, and Great Britain the "International Candle" has been submitted to the International Electrotechnical Commission, and through it to all the countries of the world which are represented on that Commission. The Hefner unit is shown to be almost exactly $\frac{1}{80}$ ths of the new unit. The comparisons between the units have been made by two methods:—(1) The direct comparisons of the flame standards in France, Germany and Great Britain. (2) Through the medium of electric sub-standards which have had values assigned to them in the National Laboratories of the four countries. The agreement between the ratio values by the two methods is very close, and is shown by a table giving the results of the various comparisons which have been made.

A paper on "Inductance and Resistance in Telephone and other Circuits" was read by Dr. J. W. Nicholson. A general formula for the effective inductance of a circuit consisting of two long parallel wires has been given by the author, and is suitable for cases in which the current distribution in either wire is greatly affected by the frequency of alternation. In the present paper certain important cases are examined in detail, and formulæ are obtained capable of immediate use. A calculation of the effective resistance is also made in each case. Attention has been mainly directed to that of the simple telephone circuit, in which the leads are not twisted round each other in order to annul the inductive effects of the earth and of neighbouring circuits. Throughout the investigation only iron and copper wires as the two extreme cases are considered. The large permeability of iron completely changes the character of the effect of frequency on its self-induction, as compared with other metals. To all metals greatly used in practice, except iron, the formulæ developed for copper wires may be applied with a nearly identical order of accuracy.

A "Note on Terrestrial Magnetism" by Mr. G. W. Walker, and a paper by Mr. A. Eagle, "On the Form of the Pulses constituting full Radiation or White Light," were taken as read.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

ABSTRACT OF THE PROCEEDINGS.

JUNE 15TH, 1909.

DR. A. SMITH WOODWARD, F.R.S., Vice-President, in the Chair.

Mr. H. W. Unthank, F.Z.S., exhibited a skull of Sphenodon with two bones on each side in the nasal region, and made the following remarks:—"In place of the usual single nasal on each side there appear to be two bones, one near the median line, the other more external, the line of division running from before backwards. On sawing across the middle of the nasal region the anterior part of the median pair of bones came away with the premaxillæ and vomers, leaving the external bones in situ. These show bevelled inner edges where they were slightly overlapped by the median bones, so that the surface-marking is that of a suture in the middle of what is usually a single nasal bone."

The Secretary exhibited the ears of an Elephant shot by Mr. Sutton Timmis, F.Z.S., on the Guaso Ngishu Plateau, east of Mt. Elgon, B. E. Africa.

Mr. J. C. White, C.I.E., C.M.Z.S., exhibited photographs of a young living specimen of a Takin (Budorcas taxicolor whitei) from Ghassa, N.W. Bhutan. The photographs had been taken on board ship at Calcutta and the animal was to be presented to the Society. The Secretary added that he had ascertained that the Takin had reached Genoa in good condition and might be expected at the Gardens about June 21st. It was the first Takin that had reached Europe alive.

On behalf of Mr. R. Lydekker, the Secretary exhibited photographs of a spotted bull Tsaine or Bantian, shot by Mr. Arthur Porter in the great forest of Siam in November, 1908, which Mr. Lydekker proposed provisionally to name Bos sondaicus porteri.

Mr. Oldfield Thomas, F.R.S., F.Z.S., exhibited specimens of a new Rat which had been obtained by Mr. G. C. Shortridge during the Society's collecting expedition to Central America. It was distinguished as follows:—

Otodylomys guatemalæ, sp. n.

Considerably larger than O. phyllotis, greyer in colour, and with the feet parti-coloured, as in some species of Tylomys.

Head and body 170 mm.; tail 161; hind foot 28; skull 40.7.

Hab. Tucuru, Guatemala. Type. B. M. No. 9.6.11.13.

Dr. F. Wood Jones, F.Z.S., gave a demonstration, illustrated by specimens, models, and lantern slides, of the method of formation of coral islands and reefs.

The purpose of the demonstration was to show that the theories of subsidence put forward by Darwin, and of solution put forward by Sir John Murray, were both untenable in the light of actual facts to be observed on coral islands.

A fresh hypothesis—that sedimentation is the most important factor—was substituted for these theories; and it was pointed out that the atoll was in reality a structure analogous to the Porites colonies the upper surfaces of which were made basin-shaped by sediment obliterating the zooids of their central area.

That the deposition of sediment below the "limiting line of sedimentation" probably accounted for the bathymetrical limit of the reef-building corals, and for the formation of sedimentation banks up to that line.

That in the making of the atoll from the basin-shaped reef the winds and the waves played the greatest part, and that atoll lagoons tended to shoal owing to the deposition of sediment within them.

That Le Conte in 1856 had said that barrier reefs stood out from shore because they were limited on one side by the depth and on the other by the muddiness of the water, and that his pronouncement accorded with every known fact.

That the question of the formation of coral structures was a zoological one and was to be solved by a study of the living zooid and that the chief agent inimical to the growth of the zooid was the deposition of sediment.

Dr. R. Broom, C.M.Z.S., exhibited an unborn foetus of Chrysochloris hottentota and two young specimens of C. asiatica, one probably only a couple of days old, and made some remarks on the habits and life-history of the Cape Moles. Dr. Broom also exhibited the skulls of two South African fossil reptiles, Lycosuchus vanderietii and Bauria cynops, the former being the most perfect Therocephalian skull yet discovered.

Dr. R. Broom, C.M.Z.S., presented a paper "On the Organ of Jacobson in Orycteropus."

Orycteropus has a long narrow organ of Jacobson which opens into the naso-palatal canal. The arrangement of the cartilages is quite different from the type found in the higher Eutheria, and there is also a marked difference from the arrangement in Dasypus. The general structure comes nearest to that of the Marsupials, though there are a number of striking differences.

Mr. F. E. Beddard, M.A., F.R.S., F.Z.S., communicated a paper entitled "On some Points in the Structure of the Lesser Anteater (Tamandua tetradactyla), with a note on the Cerebral Arteries of Myrmecophaga."

Dr. W. T. Calman, F.Z.S., presented a paper "On Decapod Crustacea from Christmas Island, collected by Dr. C. W. Andrews, F.R.S., F.Z.S."

A paper was received from Mr. H. L. Hawkins, communicated by Dr. F. A. Bather, F.R.S., F.Z.S., on "An Abnormal Individual of the Echinoid Amblyneustes."

Mr. Stanley Kemp, B.A., presented a paper, communicated by Dr. W. T. Calman, F.Z.S., entitled "The Decapods of the Genus Gennadas collected by H.M.S. Challenger."

The Secretary, Dr. P. Chalmers Mitchell, F.R.S., presented a paper entitled "Notes on a Young Walrus (Odobænus rosmarus) recently living in the Society's Gardens," and exhibited a sketch made from the living animal by Mr. Carton Moore-Park, F.Z.S.

A paper was received from Mr. R. H. Burne, M.A., F.Z.S., entitled "Notes on the Viscera of a Walrus (Odobænus rosmarus)."

CORRESPONDENCE

ROBERT BURNS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—My curiosity as to "Scrutator's" notion of Burns's "pride of place" was due to his accusation that I was doing what in me lay to bring him down from it. I am not surprised that he cannot answer my question, but that I had reasons for my curiosity will be admitted when I explain that in the book I affirm that "amid all that he borrows and utilises Burns only the more strongly manifests his own great and magic individuality," that I state that in his treatment of the old songs he "gives, perhaps, even more striking indications than in his longer poems of his own marvellous poetic vitality and of sure natural endowments as a poetic artist," that I describe "The Jolly Beggars" as one of the most remarkable productions "in the whole range of poetic creation" and equally great as "a poetic tour de force and a dramatic triumph," that I refer to "Holy Willie's Prayer" as "an artistic triumph achieved by dexterous touches almost concealed by the subtle art of the satirist," to "Tam O' Shanter" as "a marvellously vivid piece of description," and to "Hallowe'en" as "one of the pleasantest pictures of an old-world peasant interior with which," etc., etc., "ever depicted by poet." There is, of course, much more to quote, and whatever the demerits of these remarks as criticism, there is surely sufficient praise in them to glut the appetite of the most ravenous Burnsian. Yet "Scrutator" has the effrontery to accuse me of almost ignoring the merits of Burns and "laboriously magnifying" his faults. He even affirms that those who read my pages may actually turn "to seek higher ridges of Parnassus in the company of Allan Ramsay, Hamilton of Gilbertfield, and Robert Fergusson"—this notwithstanding such statements as the following: "his [Burns's] poetic flame burns much brighter than that at which it was kindled"; "even his parodies far surpass the originals"; "partly a parody of 'Leith Races,' the 'Holy Fair' is infinitely superior to it in vividness and virility," etc., etc. True, I do not rank "The Cotter's Saturday Night" with his greater masterpieces, and I also affirm that his experiments as "a hesitating and inapt disciple of the English school" do not count in any proper estimate of him as a poet, and if this is what "Scrutator" means by bringing down Burns from his "pride of place," then I, shamelessly, plead guilty to the charge.

It is all very well for "Scrutator" to seek now to climb down from the high and mighty altitude—if I may say so, the "pride of place"—of his first letter by protesting that "it is open to say that he [that is, I] and his collaborator thought, and that he still thinks, the poet overrated, and that they together and he, at his own hand, decided to see whether or not it were possible to give him his true position in the poetical ranks." It is not open to "Scrutator" to say what I think unless I tell him what I think; and I should never dream of making a general announcement in the least resembling that which "Scrutator" puts, if not into my mouth, into my thoughts; but in any case this is not what "Scrutator" originally thought it "open to say." This peeping, cheeping, or chirping note of dissatisfaction can hardly be termed a faint echo of the previous swelling and alarming bugle call: "It seems imperative on the part of everyone who respects English literature and is jealous of its foremost representatives in the council of the nations to enter a strong protest when manifest injustice is done among foreigners by one of themselves." "Mr. Henderson," now says "Scrutator," "need not expect that their combined performance or his own individual experiment should command universal assent." But I never expected this—no more than I expect that "Scrutator" by taking upon him to write "in the name of everyone who respects English literature"—or as the lord of the Universe—will secure very much assent to his protest. What the opinions about the poems of Burns are that command "universal assent" "Scrutator" apparently knoweth; I do not; and I have also yet to learn that the justice of literary criticism is to be determined by the count of heads. In reviewing "The Centenary Burns" in THE ACADEMY, the late Mr. Francis Thompson expressed the opinion that Mr. Henley was inclined to estimate too highly the gifts of Burns as "an absolute poet." He did not convince Mr. Henley, but I know that Mr. Henley fully recognised the sincerity and force of Mr. Thompson's criticism; he understood what it meant; he realised that the temperament and point of view of Mr. Thompson differed from his, and he never thought of accusing him of doing what in him lay "to bring down Burns from his pride of place." Mr. Henley's opinions and my opinions were published simply as our own; we did not assume the imperial authority of the anonymous "Scrutator"; we did not pretend to speak for the universe, or even for "everyone who respects English literature."

"Scrutator's" remarks on my examples of the allusions of Burns to Nature are quite misleading. I prefaced them by stating that they "find their place in his verse and colour his language almost without conscious effort." The example selected by "Scrutator" from Byron proves the very opposite of what he intends. Burns simply depicts the moonlight scene in its objective beauty; he could not have written the subjective "hallowing tree and tower"; and if I might presume to parody the opening paragraph of "Scrutator's" letter, I should be inclined to say that a "casual commentator" who cannot discern the poetical difference between the two examples "makes further discussion hopeless."

"Scrutator" does not deny that "let alone" is the common English equivalent for the Scottish or colloquial "let be," nor that his poetical quotations there anent were as ludicrously malapropos as I affirmed them to be. As to "cheep," he now affirms that I ought to have said that "chirp" as well as "peep" is an equivalent, if only to guard against "imminent ambiguity." But had I done so, the ambiguity would have been actual, not merely imminent, for "peep" like "cheep" refers specially to the cry of young birds, and "chirp" does not. Gamekeepers—if not noblemen—with guns on their shoulders, refer, for example, to young grouse as "cheepers," never as "chirpers."

T. F. HENDERSON.

BUNKUM.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—There is a Year Book published in London and intended apparently to guide young aspirants to free lance fame, which is more noticeable for the unconscious humour of its pages than for the utility of the information in them; albeit from the manner of the preface it seems as though the publishers thought otherwise. It boasts a bright red cover, but of its identity I say no more.

Turning first to the latter portion of this invaluable work, we find a list of American journals and magazines with descriptions, some long and some short, as to the kind of matter they require. Where the information really comes from it is impossible to say, but here are some specimens which, if typical of our Yankee cousins, God help 'em!

Argosy: "Adventure tales most desired. Themes barred are the woes of wronged women and divorced couples, also tales based on newspaper anecdotes."

Compare with this the following:

Ten Story Book: "All short fiction. Every kind of short story printable may be accepted. Prefers love, passion, humour, "Frenchy," or suggestive tales inside the line of decency."

Then again:

Short Stories: "All fiction. No healthy theme barred, only the indelicate, salacious, and yellow press dramas."

Compared with:

Young's Magazine: "Prefers bright, risqué, spicy stories. Authors are urged to study the magazine before contributing."

What all-round fellows they are across the pond! There is, too, a candour about these editorial hints (if such they are) which just licks creation, as witness:

People's Home Journal: "Payment low and varying"—while People's Magazine (edited, by the way, by a Mr. Moses), wants:

"Stories of criminal classes, but not the cheap, trite tales written in new Bowery dialect."

And what about this?

Pacific Monthly: "Eschews the morbid and neurotic. Office is low in acceptance of MSS., but exceeding courteous."

What in heaven's name does it all mean?

Broadway Magazine: Like many another lacking the courage of its convictions, "bars sex problems," while

The Delineator desires "the best little stories that are written," and wishes it may get them—cheap! And

Mother's Magazine strikes a highly original note by describing itself as "exclusively for mothers and would-be mothers, not necessarily U.S.A.—bright, vivacious, and bracing."

In conclusion it is only fair to add that the only person I ever knew who acted upon the advice of this weird publication received a courteous reply from the U.S.A. stating that the Editor was not responsible for the information published, and in fact, desired "copy" of exactly the opposite nature!

Yet it is not only the American end of the book that appeals to one's sense of the picturesque, for even our British journals have their happy (or unhappy) moments. For instance, the Burlington Magazine: "Cannot accept MSS. compiled from works of reference." While the Halfpenny Comic calls loudly for "sensational jokes." Why, too, does Home Chat go out of its way to say that its stories need be "not necessarily of intense love interest"? And

Yes or No that it will take: "tales of adventure, crime, humour, or love," when it would have been so much simpler to say "takes anything"?

But one might go on ad infinitum, were it not for stress of space, so I will conclude with what is probably the gem of the book—the limit of droll, libellous sarcasm on the part of somebody or other.

Pluck: "Carmelite House, E.C. A magazine for boys. Established by Messrs. Harmsworth, and provides healthy boys' yarns against the pernicious factor of the penny and half-penny papers!"

After which—good-night.

"CLEARNESS" IN PROSE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Your interesting correspondent, "A French Linguist," and one or two other writers in your last issue, raise the question of clearness in prose, and it is generally regarded as the chief beauty in style. There are one or two considerations dominating this question which, so far as I know, have been overlooked by writers on style in literature.

The writer who is clear to all readers is working on a very low and commonplace plane of thought. A writer may express a profound idea in most fitting terms, but he will be clear only to the few who have glimpsed the thought for themselves, or are mentally prepared for it; other readers will impute their own confusion of thought to the writer. Those "clear" and bright sentences which are regarded as the perfection of style may, quite unintentionally, be utterly misleading. They express bright and clear but narrow conceptions, those petty fragments of truth which set men quarrelling. They are those ex parte statements which are so demoralising in the political Press.

From the philosophical standpoint it is seen that every fact is rooted in infinity; every event is a moment in an endless chain of cause and effect, all things are interwoven in the warp and the woof of the "garment of God" by which we see Him, as Goethe has it. So we cannot isolate anything in thought to get a clear conception of it without falsifying it to some extent. We do as the artist does who puts a sharp and clear outline round his objects, which make them as untrue to Nature as the stained glass saints are with their leaded outlines! Clearness of conception is needed for clearness of expression, and only the smaller things can be clearly conceived, and they are falsified in the process. So the clearest writers are necessarily both false and shallow. This is seen instantly if we look at the matter from the painter's standpoint instead of the writer's.

The problem, then, for the writer as well as for the painter, is the means by which things which have been "clearly" described and emphasised, and to that extent isolated, can be restored to their right setting as part of a stupendous whole, and to their right relations. Here the artist steps in, and clearness is only part of his aim. Clearness belittles, deprives things of their atmosphere; so the true aim is to give the truth of impression, and to suggest infinitely more than he can say. The writer who gives me a new thought is my benefactor, but the man who stimulates me to think a new thought for myself is doubly my benefactor. So stimulating suggestiveness, in literature as fine art, is of higher value than clearness.

The mind should be so stimulated as to arouse into activity those transcendent faculties which rise above time and space, and give us glimpses of that larger, that cosmic consciousness towards which we are slowly ascending. This is done by appealing to the sense of beauty; by beauty of statement our words are enriched with an emotional accompaniment giving them a double appeal, as the soul is stirred by music enriching the words of a song. When the soul soars it is in touch of the larger realities, and the facts presented to it will be seen or felt in their larger relations, and a higher order of truth is attained. So the great prose writer is virtually a poet in sight and feeling, and he tends to merge into the prophet.

I have only hinted one aspect of a many-sided truth, but hints suffice for the wise. Of course, I have no word for the unskilled sciolist who cannot make himself clear on the lower planes of thought; my contention is that before condemning a writer for obscurity we should be quite sure that we can rise to his standpoint. Then we should be sure of his aim; he may be content to stuff us with the food of facts and sauce of comment; or he may be trying to jolt us out of our ruts, and to stimulate our own mental activity, and lack of clearness may be on the side of the reader, and not on the writer's part. Setting aside faults in technical construction, I should say that the absolutely clear is either small or commonplace, and it is by keeping thought on these lower planes that we set men quarrelling when they should be co-operating.

E. WAKE COOK.

GEORGE MEREDITH'S "GENIUS."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—It is my humble opinion, and, I believe, the opinion of those who understand literature, that George Meredith, even though dead, has not yet "come to his own." Your correspondent, Mr. Ridley, will perhaps, therefore, pardon me when I deplore his letter, published in your issue of the 19th of this month, which appears to contain an expression of the average person's point of view plus a statement that Meredith's poetry is greater than his prose. Mr. Ridley finds in "Richard Feverel" nothing better than "admirable diction, biting sarcasm, graceful portrayal, and mournful pessimism." I will not insult a correspondent of yours by pretending to believe that he imagines he is adopting a novel and interesting attitude by saying this, but I should like to remind him that there was no need to say it; go per cent. of those who have read the book have already said it; surely it is a pity for these to be encouraged in their misunderstanding. In another passage Mr. Ridley uses the terms "confused" and (with reference to "The Egoist") "chaotic," which strike me as terms one would have expected from a schoolgirl just beginning to read, not from a person of Mr. Ridley's eminent understanding.

Mr. Ridley will not care to know what I find in "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," but may I ask him to fetch out his Stevenson?—Stevenson, the seeker after, the lover of clearness, if ever there was one in this world. If he will do so and will read through "Across the Plains" he will discover, in a certain later essay, what "R. L. S." found in the first meeting of Lucy with Richard. Somehow I do not think that Stevenson (the seeker after the right word) would have endorsed "confused" with reference to the art of a man, the consideration of whom suggested to him the name "Shakespeare." Would not "a stumbling-block to babes" have been a better phrase?

Mr. Ridley says that Meredith "could never shake off his obsessing ego, or, like Dickens . . . lose himself entirely in the characters of his creation." Could he not? Did he not, in "The Adventures of Harry Richmond"? I admit that he did not in "Beauchamp's Career," but did he not, in—yes, even in "The Egoist"? There is a story that on the publication of "The Egoist" a young man rushed wildly to Meredith and said, "It's me! I'm The Egoist." Meredith replied, "So am

I. So is every man." Surely to criticise oneself one must shake off one's ego, hold it at arm's length and laugh at it. I do not think that Meredith will be found to have been the one obsessed.

I am very glad that Mr. Ridley admits "... the lamented novelist was a gifted and accomplished writer." Such praise is good indeed. But he also writes "... so dark was he, that none but professed ... devotees to the occult could pretend to interpret his actual meaning, or to proclaim his precise 'gospel.'" I do not want to be rude, but is Mr. Ridley really referring to Meredith? Has he not made a mistake in the name, intending some other one? "Dark?" Meredith, more than all, was a painter with light colours. He was a writer of brilliant comedy; he abhorred the dark; look how, even in "The Ordeal," he could not confine himself to gloom. "Devotees to the occult"! Does Mr. Ridley refer to "The Shaving of Shagpat," or perhaps to Mrs. Berry? But it is necessary to be serious. I hope, sir, that there are other points in Mr. Ridley's letter on which you do not agree with your correspondent. Permit me to close with the suggestion—trite enough to you, but possibly helpful to Mr. Ridley—that Meredith's gospel is the gospel of sanity, of courage, of the bright duty of youth; and that it is only by realising that the great novelist was not "more concerned about the manner of delivery of his 'message' than about its actual delivery" that one can understand that message. Mr. Ridley has not understood the meaning of the mission; he therefore concludes that there is none.

LEONARD INKSTER.

FLAUBERT AND ST. GERTRUDE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—I have been reading with interest the letter which appeared under the above heading in your last week's issue.

Your correspondent touches on some view of Flaubert as typical of the active seeker after the "fit" word, and of St. Gertrude as symbolising, as it were, the faculty of immediate and vivid apprehension. It has occurred to me that perhaps the writer's thought has been dominated by symbolism further than he realised, or, at least, more than is immediately apparent. I mean in regard to the choosing of a woman as contrast to a man in the complementary functions of selecting and of passively appreciating. Whether purposed or not, I think the point is suggestive. A woman by her very nature spends how much of her life in an attitude of waiting, listening as it were! There is something in the soul of a woman that is attuned to expectancy, to the sitting quiet with folded hands and hushed breath and ear quick to discern the distant footfall. With what quiet of concentration does a woman wait to hear how you will say her name, how alert is she to catch the most delicate of even unconscious inflections! And, too, is it not the things that must be said quietly that most appeal to her, that she is ever the most anxious to hear? Mary, sitting "awed" in her "white bed" (pictured with what sense of quietude by Rossetti!), is typical of the attitude of woman in so much of her real, her inner life. And so in the quick apprehension of the "fit" word, there is already there a naive aptitude by her very nature. A woman's ear is quick to detect the delicate subtleties in words, to catch the implication, to feel, as with some sort of immediate sense, the light and colour, laughter, sadness, tears in them. She is trained to a sense of the value of delicate suggestion—witness her rooms—the pot-pourri on the table by the bedside—the lavendered chests for cambrics and laces. And in words the same trained instinct has a sort of immediate, pleasurable consciousness of the individual fragrances of those things that give to a word its distinction and personal grace. Thus perhaps might St. Gertrude be taken to stand for a further symbolism, for the receptivity of all women, their power of recognising, of responding to the fit word. For is it not typically woman's peculiar privilege to listen—to hear the "word" spoken as in the stillness of dawn—and to respond, with eyes alive with the joy of the full meaning, "Ecce Ancilla . . ."?

HIGH POINTING.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—A French Linguist, whose comments on "knotty points" of English grammar I find interesting and suggestive, seems to think that some writers are too sparing in the use of the comma. Not being an authority on the subject,

I do not venture to offer any opinion on the general question, but I believe I am correct in saying that in one part of his last letter your correspondent has erred in inserting a comma where none ought to appear. (I assume that he is responsible for the punctuation, though it has been frequently stated that compositors take that matter into their own hands.)

Here is the passage referred to:—"The English orators, whom I have hitherto heard in London, generally stopped for a second or two after the adverbial phrase," etc.

This might be taken to mean that all English orators "generally stopped," etc., whereas, of course, the writer meant the remark to apply only to those of them he had heard in London. No doubt the word "hitherto" should be taken into account by the reader, but had there been no comma after "orators" the meaning would have been quite plain, even though "hitherto" had been left out as well. It is unmistakably a case where the adjective clause should be in the restrictive, not in the co-ordinating form; and according to Bain's "Higher English Grammar" (1879 edition), page 337, "A restrictive adjective clause is not separated by a comma from the noun."

Bain, in this instance, would probably have preferred the relative pronoun "that" to "whom," so as to add to the restrictive force of the clause, "The English orators that I have heard," etc. Many writers, again, would dispense with the pronoun in any form in such a case.

I am, etc.,

WILKIE COLLINS AND MR. LE QUEUX.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Mr. Le Queux is quite right. I am one "who has apparently never handled pearls of great price"—unless, indeed, the thumbing of a sample or so of Mr. Le Queux's amazing fictions may be so described. Like Mr. Le Queux himself I am by way of being "a literary gent," and I am content to leave the "handling" of pearls to—the pawnbrokers. But, perhaps, I may be permitted to handle a correspondence in my own little way.

It has taken a considerable time to draw Mr. Le Queux. And even now that he has stooped to take up the challenge thrown down to him in your columns he does not appear to have got us any "forrarder." For my letter at which he makes a feint was but supplementary to a communication published in THE ACADEMY so long ago as April last. Therein Mr. Le Queux was invited to make good his statement that he was an "old friend" of Wilkie Collins. In my, more recently published, letter I ventured to add an expression of my own scepticism regarding the existence of any such old friendship, and I proceeded to quote from an experience of Mr. Le Queux's, recently published in Printer's Pie, as illustrating the fact that the author of it is prone to the imagination of vain things, and that, on the whole, he takes himself rather too seriously.

In his comments on the communications of "N. N." and myself, Mr. Le Queux makes no reference whatever to his alleged friendship with Wilkie Collins—the only thing in the correspondence that matters—but obligingly offers to convey to me privately the name of a bank manager in the Strand who really is an "old friend" of his. I do not desire any private correspondence with Mr. Le Queux. His statement that he was an "old friend" of Wilkie Collins has been publicly made. It has been publicly challenged in THE ACADEMY by "N. N." and by the writer of this letter. Cannot Mr. Le Queux see that he now owes it to himself either publicly to substantiate his statement or publicly to withdraw it? Many of us have the pleasure of knowing bank managers in the Strand and elsewhere; few of us enjoyed the privilege of being admitted to the friendship of Wilkie Collins.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "QUOIT."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

SIR,—Mr. Mayhew's strictures (ACADEMY, June 19th) on my note on quoit (ACADEMY, June 12th) should have been addressed to the editors of the Supplement to Jamieson. I do not go further than suggesting the identity of S. "cute," a quoit, or curling-stone," with S. "cute," a small coin," an identity which appears to me to be strongly supported by E. penny-stone, G. Plafferstein, It. piastrella, and by the quotations I gave from Shakespeare and Middleton. As for "boldly equating" E.

quoit with Scand. kvitt, if Mr. Mayhew will glance through my article again he will see that I only mention the Jamieson etymology without comment.

E. W.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

STR,—I have a suggestion to make on this subject, which I beg to submit to the judgment of students of the English language. I think there can be no doubt that coite, the oldest form of "quoit" in an English text, is of French origin. I would suggest that coite (or coyt, the Promptorium form) is identical with a well-known Norman-French coite, used by writers of the 12th century in the sense of the rowel of a spur. Moisy has "Coite, molette, partie de l'éperon en forme de petite roue, munie de pointes, qui servent à piquer les flancs du cheval." The phrase "à coite d'esperon" is of frequent occurrence in Norman texts, as one may see from Moisy's "Glossary," and from Didot's "Appendix to Ducange."

Now, is it not possible, I ask any candid unprejudiced etymologist, that this Norman-French coite used in the sense of a rowel may be identical with the Prompt. coyt, used in the sense of another "petit objet en forme de roue," a small disc, which was the original shape of the quoit?

But what is the etymology of the Norman word? That's the doubtful point. There occurs in Norman texts the verb coiter "aiguillonner, pousser." Is this word (as Moisy holds) a derivative of coite, a rowel, or is coite a verbal substantive from coiter? I think that Moisy is wrong, and that coite is derived from coiter. The etymology of the verb is quite clear. The etymology of coite apart from coiter would be a difficult thing to find.

The Norman coiter "aiguillonner" appears in the Southern French form coitar, and is used in various senses. The Provençal coitar means "to hasten, to push on," and also "to torment, to cause sharp pain." It is derived from a Romanic form coctare (a derivative of coctus, pp. of coquere, to cook) "to cause pain, to torment." Compare the well-known use of French cuire "causer une douleur âpre et aiguë, Telle qu'est celle que cause une brûlure ou une écorchure"; and the use of cuisant "âpre, piquant, aigu: Une douleur cuisante." Now, what can be more "piquant, aigu" than the rowel of a spur?

The conclusion of the matter is that the Norman coite, a rowel, may be derived from coiter, to cause sharp pain; and that it is possibly identical with the Prompt. coyt and our modern word quoit.

A. L. MAYHEW.

ENGLISH HISTORY THROUGH AMERICAN GLASSES.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

STR,—Your correspondent, Mr. George Stronach, at page 233 implies that Mr. Price Collier, an American writer, is incorrect in giving the year 1649 as the date of Charles II.'s accession to the throne. But, as the legitimate successor of Charles I., Charles II. began to reign from the moment of his father's death on January 30th, 1648 (old style), 1649 (new style). History-tellers who give 1660 as the year of Charles II.'s accession are incorrect unless we are to admit that "worldly men" can "depose the deputy elected by the Lord."
